I am very concerned about my 80-year-old brother. He recently lost his wife, and his health is failing. I am worried about him living on his own. He cannot cook, does not know how to do the laundry, and is not capable of cleaning. What should I do?

BSS

Dear BSS,

I recommend that your brother have a needs assessment in order to determine whether or not he is at risk remaining at home alone. Your local public health unit (CLSC in Quebec) may provide this service.

They, or an agency that serves the elderly, may also offer home care services and/or refer your brother to resources in the community such as Meals on Wheels and cleaning services. In some areas, there are now publicly subsidized, funded cleaning agencies that will provide cleaning services to seniors at a reduced fee.

You may also consider suggesting to your brother the option of leaving his home and moving to a residence. You could suggest that the two of you visit a few residences together to see if he might be interested in this type of living arrangement.

Remember, whatever you do, you must consult with your brother and make sure that he is involved in the decision-making process.

Readers are invited to send any questions they have for Jesse to The CJN. Jesse represents the management and staff of Jewish Support Services for the Elderly (JSSE) in Montreal.

Ambassador Berger ends term in Israel

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TEL AVIV — "There is never a dull moment here," marvelled David Berger, Canada's outgoing ambassador to Israel. "That's what life in Israel is like."

Warming up to the topic, Berger observed, "Israelis say, 'What a country! There's no other country like it.' I've come to appreciate the depths of feelings Israelis have for this tiny country. It's easy to get swept up by the affairs of Israel."

Berger, a 49-year-old former federal parliamentarian, leaves his post at the end of August after four years. During his term of office, which was extended by a year at his request, four Israeli prime ministers came and went, probably a record for a Canadian ambassador in the Jewish state.

Berger, who is fairly fluent in Hebrew, arrived in Tel Aviv in the twilight months of Yitzhak Rabin's premiership. Witnessing the reigns of Rabin's successors, Shimon Peres and Benjamin Netanyahu, Berger will leave just as Ehud Barak settles into his job.

He was appointed by Prime Minister Jean Chrétien after vacating his St. Henri-Westmount seat in Montreal to Lucienne Robillard on the eve of the 1995 referendum on Quebec sovereignty.

In Israel, he witnessed a number of historic events: the Oslo 2 agreement, Rabin's assassination, Israel's deployments from the West Bank, elections in the Palestinian self-rule areas, the wave of suicide bombings perpetrated by Islamic fundamentalists, Israel's military offensive in Lebanon (Operation Grapes of Wrath), and last May's general election.

During this tumultuous period, Canada signed a free trade pact with Israel, a development which has led to a 40 percent increase in bilateral trade since 1997.

Study links breast cancer with heredity

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Evidence of the hereditary nature of breast cancer in Jewish women is overwhelming, said Dr. Ellen Warner, a medical oncologist at Toronto's Sunnybrook Regional Cancer Centre.

Ashkenazi women who develop breast cancer before the age of 50 have been shown to have a much higher probability of mutations of the BRCA1 or BRCA2 genes, according to a study published last week in Journal of the National Cancer Institute.

These mutations are associated with a high lifetime risk of invasive breast cancer.

Warner, who has been involved in the research for this study, said that there are important implications for these women's first and second degree relatives – mothers, daughters, sisters, aunts or grandmothers.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Canada Stays Away

OTTAWA — Canada did not attend a controversial July 15 meeting in Gevena, convened to discuss whether Jewish settlements in Israel's territories violate international law. Michael O'Shaughnessy, a spokesman for the Foreign Affairs department, said Canada stayed away from the conference "because at this time, it was unhelpful to the Mideast peace process." The Swiss-chaired conference attracted delegates from 103 countries, but was adjourned after only 30 minutes, with agreement that it would reconvene only if the situation in the territories flares up. The meeting was triggered by the United Nations' 115-2 vote last February to convene a conference on the applicability of the Geneva Conventions in the territories. Canada backed the resolution, but later said it would work to have the meeting postponed.

ISRAEL

Secret Talks Held

JERUSALEM — Former Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu confirmed reports that he had secretly negotiated with Syria to hand over the Golan Heights. In an Israeli television interview, Netanyahu said Syria agreed to a key Israeli demand to maintain a strategic early-warning station on Mount Hermon. He denied reports that he had agreed to a withdrawal to pre-1967 borders.

Environmental Danger

JERUSALEM — Israel's environment is near collapse, according to a new report. The country's air, water and transportation systems are in dire need of environmental improvements, and as a result, one in 10 of Israeli children suffers from asthma, according to the report, which was sponsored by the Israel Economic Forum. The report recommended several ways to improve the environment, including increased education, vehicle emission regulations and a polluters' tax.

WORLD

Turkish Offer

JERUSALEM — Israeli officials welcomed a Turkish offer to sell the Jewish state water to help solve chronic shortages. During a visit to Israel this month, Turkey's president, Suleyman Demirel, offered to supply the Jewish state with some six billion cubic feet of water a year.

Israeli Astronaut

WASHINGTON — An Israeli astronaut and Israeli cargo will be launched on a U.S. space shuttle next year, President Bill Clinton announced during his meetings here earlier this month with Prime Minister Ehud Barak. The two leaders agreed to establish a committee made up of NASA and the Israel Space Agency for the "development of practical applications in the peaceful use of space."

Barak Mum on Pollard

WASHINGTON — Prime Minister Ehud Barak raised the fate of Jonathan Pollard with President Clinton and proposed separating the Israeli spy's release from the peace process, according to a senior U.S. official. Barak said the matter should be handled privately and refused to answer questions about Pollard in a news conference with Clinton.

Lithuanian Probe

SYDNEY — Lithuania plans to conduct an inquiry into an alleged Nazi war criminal living in Australia. Antanas Gudelis, 87, allegedly commanded various Nazi-sponsored police units that murdered thousands of civilians in Lithuania before he immigrated to Australia in 1949. Australia's Jewish community welcomed the probe.

Argentine Blast Marked

BUENOS AIRES — Argentina's Jews marked the fifth anniversary of the deadly bombing of the Jewish community centre here by reiterating their long-standing calls for the capture of those responsible for the crime. An estimated 3,000 people attended the ceremony this month commemorating the AMIA bombing, which killed 86 people and wounded some 300 others. The commemorations came after an Argentine prosecutor said he is seeking to charge 19 people, 10 of them former police officials, in connection with the bombing.

Alleged Nazi Can Stay: Judge

TORONTO — A judge has ruled that an 81-year-old British Columbia resident can stay in Canada despite allegations that he worked as a guard at a Nazi-run camp in Latvia from 1941 to 1943.

Lawyers for Eduards Podins contended that he was a grocer and had nothing to do with guarding prisoners at the camp near Valmiera, Latvia.

Podins was on the Nazi payroll as an auxiliary police officer, but the judge found that he had actually worked as a shopkeeper.

The judge also ruled that since Podins was not asked about his wartime experience when he entered Canada from Britain in 1959, he cannot be accused of lying about his wartime record.

The judge further ruled that although inmates were subject to forced labor, beatings and at least one execution, the camp should be considered a prison camp and did not show the "systematic brutality" of a concentration camp.

"We are concerned that the judge seems to have imposed a higher standard of evidence for a Nazi war criminal than is currently required for ordinary immigrants and refugees," remarked Jewish community legal activist David Matas.

Ottawa has initiated denaturalization and deportation proceedings against about 15 Nazi war crimes suspects.

Including the latest ruling, the federal war-crimes unit has lost three of the last six cases brought to trial. Another six cases are in progress.

Lord's Prayer battle not over

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Both sides say they will appeal the decision of a human rights tribunal that heard a complaint regarding the daily recitation of the Lord's Prayer in some Saskatoon classrooms, whatever that ruling will be.

However, the lawyer representing the nine parents who launched the complaint in 1993 says the school board's opposition to discontinuing the prayer appears to be softening.

Dan Shapiro told The CJN that recent published reports in the area have indicated that of the seven trustees on the Saskatoon public school board, four have said they would support suspension of the Lord's Prayer, which would obviate the need for a legal appeal.

However, Lindsay Fast, chair of the Saskatoon Board of Education, had nothing to say.

"I will make my comments at the board table. Goodbye," Fast told The CJN.

Four days of testimony wrapped up in Saskatoon earlier this month to hear the complaint, brought by parents from Muslim, Unitarian and Jewish backgrounds, who want the prayer dropped, alleging it discriminates against non-Christians.

Roughly one-fifth of Saskatoon's 550 public classrooms begin their day with the Lord's Prayer. Some teachers include Bible readings.

The board allows non-Christian children to leave the class during opening exercises, or not participate.

The school board argued that religious instruction was guaranteed to Saskatchewan when it agreed to join Confederation in 1905. The board says the province's human rights commission has no jurisdiction in this case because the human rights code cannot impinge on the Constitution.

The board says it would consider a new policy allowing multi-faith prayers, but that can't happen under existing law.

Please see related item on page 12.

Both the lawyer representing the board and its director said the current practice will continue until the law changes.

The retired judge who heard the case said the board's refusal to drop the Lord's Prayer is "a formidable obstacle" to resolving the issue.

Intervening in the case were the local Jewish community and B'nai Brith Canada.

Forcing children to recite the Lord's Prayer is a "coercive" act, which renders the whole point of religious exercise "meaningless," testified Rabbi Roger Pavey, spiritual leader of Saskatoon's Congregation Agudas Israel.

Prayer should be voluntary, he told the tribunal.

Rabbi Pavey said that current options – allowing non-Christian children to leave the classroom during prayers, simply not to participate in them, or to quietly say their own prayers – should be unacceptable to all faiths.

The school board "is undermining its own stated values of tolerance and self-esteem by labeling some children as deviant or forcing them to recite the prayer," he said.

Also testifying was Grant Scharfstein, president of Congregation Agudas Israel, who said the Jewish community has been trying to stop the recitation of the Lord's Prayer in classrooms since 1953, with no results.

He said his own children still recite the prayer because they don't want to be singled out.

Scharfstein recounted his own experience growing up in Niacam, a small town east of Saskatoon. One day, after being exempted from prayer by an understanding teacher, he was punched by a classmate on the way home, and called "a dirty Jew."

"It's an incident I certainly won't forget," he said. "I don't want my children going through that."

Mandatory recitation of the Lord's Prayer can harm a child's self-esteem, Karen Mock, an educational psychologist and director of B'nai Brith Canada's League for Human Rights, told the hearing.

Non-Christian children might come to believe their faith is inferior, a feeling that could be bolstered by their exclusion from the classroom, Mock stated.

And in order for children to develop healthy self-esteem about to which cultural or religious group they belong, they need to know they are "equally valued by the powers-that-be," she added.

Otherwise, "Kids will go home to their parents and say, 'Why do I have to be Jewish? I don't want to be Jewish.'

"What the board is doing goes against everything educators know today about children and learning. [It's] saying it's okay to make one group of children feel bad, while elevating another."

Mock also pointed out that Calgary's school board ended the recitation of the Lord's Prayer 29 years ago, despite facing the same laws as Saskatchewan and the same guarantees when it entered Confederation.

As well, she noted that Manitoba, British Columbia and Ontario have all ended prayers in public classrooms.

Shapiro said the commission chair did not indicate when he would hand down a ruling.

Cops train in online hate

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Canadian branch of the Simon Wiesenthal Center (SWC) recently launched a new initiative in its ongoing battle against Internet hate sites.

The centre is now offering two-day Internet training sessions to Canadian police departments, free of charge.

Detective-Constable David Johnson of the Guelph City Police hadn't used the Internet much because he wasn't very literate on it, he told The CJN.

As a member of the persons crime unit, Johnson deals with hate crimes and other criminal cases. His recent training "came in pretty handy" when he was faced with investigations that involved online threats. "Now I know my way around."

Johnson has also passed on some of the "little tricks" he learned to a couple of his colleagues.

In the past five years, the number of hate sites on the Internet has grown from 50 to almost 2,000, said Sol Littman, SWC's Canadian director.

They have become more sophisticated in terms of graphics, and depict "terribly nasty stuff," said Littman.

The Canadian Radio-television and Telecommunications Commission's recent decision that the Internet need not come under its jurisdiction, was a factor prompting the SWC's new initiative.

"If you're going to depend on existing laws involving hate, pornography, etc., then somebody has to enforce those laws," explained Littman.

"We discovered that the police did not have the technical knowledge to do the kind of monitoring job we were doing," he said.

Working in small groups at SWC headquarters with the centre's Internet specialist Abbee Corb, the officers from a number of locations in the province have learned their way around search engines, chat rooms and hate sites.

Will peace find a harbor?

The election of Ehud Barak to the prime ministership of Israel has, as expected, breathed fresh life into the formerly limp sails of the peace process.

In the week leading up to his swearing-in at the Knesset, Barak conducted indirect talks, as it were, through the medium of British journalist Patrick Seale, with Syrian President Hafez al-Assad.

In the week following his swearing-in, Barak met with Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak, Jordan's King Abdullah and PNC Chairman Yasser Arafat.

After his meeting with Arafat, Barak returned to Israel only long enough to pack his bags for a six-day visit in the United States which included extensive talks with President Bill Clinton, administration officials and leaders of Congress.

On his way home from the United States, Prime Minister Barak stopped off in London to pay a visit to Britain's prime minister Tony Blair.

By all accounts, Barak succeeded at each stop in leaving his host with a feeling of impending movement and forward momentum.

But even if the sails on the ship are at full billow and the captain is steering with new direction, there is no guarantee of a final harbor.

Some of the narrows – Jerusalem, repatriation, water, borders – may simply prove impassable.

For the time being at least, there does appear to be sufficient good will, as well as an element of urgency, among various key leaders, to try earnestly to "reach shore."

There are at least three reasons for the sense of urgency.

First, it is undoubtedly due in part, to the fact that two of the Arab leaders – Yasser Arafat and Hafez al-Assad – are in failing health, and they want to "settle matters" before they yield power to their respective successors.

Arafat especially, by far the more publicly visible of the two leaders, looks and sounds increasingly frail in each photo opportunity. At times, he even appears disoriented on camera.

Second, it no doubt also arises from the fact that President Clinton would like to achieve a significant foreign policy success, such as peace between Arabs and Israelis, before the end of his presidency.

Third, Ehud Barak genuinely believes that peace is urgently needed for its own sake, that it is attainable, and that the change in government has put in place a new psychological climate to enable the parties to grasp it right now.

Grasping, however, is how best to describe the announced public gesture of "goodwill" two weeks ago by the Palestinians towards the newly elected Israeli prime minister.

On July 15, the much heralded UN special conference met in Geneva to examine Israel's record toward the Palestinians of the West Bank and Gaza, in accordance with the Fourth Geneva Convention on the treatment of civilian populations during times of war.

The meeting lasted 30 minutes before it adjourned.

Palestinian Authority Planning Minister Nabil Shaath said the adjournment amounted to a "benefit of the doubt to Barak."

UN still inhospitable to Israel

Israeli foreign ministry spokesperson Yitzhak Lior spoke more to the truth when he said of the Palestinian acceptance of the adjournment, "When they saw it was disintegrating, they opted probably to present it as a kind of a gesture toward the new prime minister."

Even though nothing concrete was achieved at the meeting, it did nevertheless, still manage to leave on the record the possibility of reconvening in the future and the consensus statement "reaffirming the applicability of the Fourth Geneva Convention to the Occupied Palestinian Territory, including Jerusalem."

The adjournment, therefore, was at best, a nuisance and an irritant to the government of Israel. At worst, it was merely a respite in the inevitable continuation of the tactics of demonization and delegitimization of the Jewish State.

A number of worrisome and deeply regrettable conclusions flow from the adjournment.

- The Geneva Convention is still left "on the UN's table," to be served at a later date, like a chicken bone to get stuck in Israel's throat.
- Jerusalem too, is still left on the table.
- The UN is still, fundamentally inhospitable to Israel. The entire February and July ploy provides further proof of the assertion by Arnold Beichman in the June 27 issue of the Washington Times that "the UN is at its most malevolent in its mistreatment of Israel."

The adjournment thus goes hand-in-hand with the Palestinians' recent avowed determination to resurrect UN General Assembly Resolution 181, the resolution in 1947 that partitioned Palestine into Jewish and Arab sectors and which called for separate, international status for Jerusalem.

We will continue to monitor and respond to the attempt by the Palestinians to wrest Jerusalem away from the Jews.

Where indeed is the harbor for peace in the middle east? MBD

New cantor 'breathed the world of liturgy'

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue's new cantor has made a name for himself in the world of Jewish music by intertwining Sephardi and Ashkenazi elements in his work.

"Maybe we are different in culture – one eats gefilte fish, one eats hot, spicy fish on Friday night – but the Jewish neshama is one," said Moroccan-born Cantor Aaron Bensoussan in a recent interview at Beth Emeth.

A veteran of the stage – and bimah – in North America, Europe, Israel and Australia, the 45-year-old lyric tenor has an eclectic musical repertoire that includes cantorial, Yiddish, Israeli, chassidic, Ladino, Broadway and operatic pieces, along with his own Sephardi compositions.

Of his almost half-dozen recordings, the newest is Keter Zohar, a melding of jazz with Moroccan folklore music. In the works is a CD by the musical group, Sons of Sepharad, which also includes fellow Moroccan Gerard Edery and the cantor's colleague Alberto Mizrahi.

Cantor Bensoussan is set to move here next week with his wife Phyllis, an audiologist, and their four-year-old son. The cantor served for the past 11 years at Temple Beth Sholom, a Conservative synagogue in Roslyn Heights, NY.

As a child, he "breathed the world of liturgy" in Mogador, an Atlantic seaport in French Morocco, known – according to Encyclopaedia Judaica – for its Jewish musicians.

The Bensoussan family traces its history to pre-Inquisition Spain and before that to Fez, Morocco, where an ancestor taught Maimonides in the mid-1100s.

Cantor Aaron Bensoussan

Cantor Bensoussan remembers Mogador as a "Sephardic shtetl" with a close-knit Jewish community. "There was a warmth you cannot duplicate," he said.

He recalls the air being filled with the aroma of dafina, the Moroccan equivalent of cholent, as he walked home from synagogue with his father every Saturday.

The cantor's Ashkenazi influence came later, after the family emigrated to New York in 1968. He spent about five years at an Ashkenazi yeshiva in Chicago, and received his cantorial training primarily at the Jewish Theological Seminary of America.

Music has been a part of Cantor Bensoussan's life as long as he can remember. He learned to play the oud (Arabic lute) and the darbouka (Arabic hand drum) as a child.

His father was a businessman with musical aptitude who was well versed in chazzanut. He served as one of the cantor's early teachers along with some of Mogador's master musicians.

"I always wanted to be a singer," said Cantor Bensoussan. But it wasn't until he was 18, when he heard renowned Cantor David Koussevitsky, that he decided to pursue a career as a cantor.

"I love the stage, I love being a cantor, and I love people," said Cantor Bensoussan, who believes his career has combined the best of all worlds for him.

His early training in Sephardi liturgy, with its intricate trills, proved to be a good base for his cantorial studies.

The cantor's musical style, in his student days, was conventionally Ashkenazi, but over the years, he has incorporated an eclectic variety of musical elements – many reflecting his Sephardi background – into the liturgy.

"I have a good feeling that I will bring something new to [Beth Emeth] and the synagogue will bring something new to me," he said.

"I feel very fortunate to continue the tradition of Beth Emeth of having high standards of music," he added, referring to his predecessor, Cantor Louis Danto, who retired last year.

Cantor Bensoussan is looking forward to living in Toronto, with its cosmopolitan population.

"As an artist and as a cantor," he said, "I breathe better when I see a variety of people." The mix of cultures and musical backgrounds inspires him, he explained.

"If I accomplished something in my life, it's to bring the Ashkenazi and Sephardi worlds as close as I can." Cantor Bensoussan said. "They actually work beautifully together."

Joint project for haredi youth

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A team of Israeli social workers was in Toronto recently to examine the feasibility of a joint project aimed at ultra-Orthodox adolescents at risk.

The week-long trip formed the first phase of what organizers hope will be a collaborative effort between the Department of Social Services of the Municipality of Jerusalem; the University of Toronto's social work faculty; and Jewish Family & Child Service (JF&CS).

The Israelis – three social workers, a rabbi and a volunteer – met with their Canadian counterparts to explore common ground; namely, to identify social problems related to high-risk youth in the haredi community, and to find ways to deliver services.

Haredi rabbis approve effort

A study prepared by Jerusalem social workers says children in haredi families experience the same social ills as products of less religious homes: family problems, violence, dropping out of school, vagrancy, criminal behavior, drug abuse and sexual promiscuity.

Haredim comprise about 10 percent of Israel's population, but nearly one-third of Jerusalem's residents. Traditionally, the haredi community has spurned outside help, and developed its own social service system, despite underfunding and the stigma attached to dealing with family problems.

But Zippi Leffler, director of the Child, Youth & Family division of Jerusalem's department of social services, says haredim are increasingly turning to civic authorities for help.

And, she adds, secular authorities are learning how to deal with a community that has closed itself off from the outside world.

"You don't have to be Orthodox to be open-minded. It helps to know their language and culture, and not to bring personal beliefs into the situation," she told The CJN. It's taken "years" to establish mutual trust, she added.

Even haredi rabbis have given the effort their stamp of approval, Leffler said, proving that bridges can be gapped.

Of a caseload of 300 adolescents treated by the Jerusalem unit, about 50 are from haredi families. The unit has established several programs for them, including a 14-bed hostel for male youths, a therapeutic and educational centre for young women, a shelter for up to five females in need of an emergency facility, a group home, and a community treatment program in Jerusalem's haredi neighborhoods.

The relationship between the Jerusalem unit and JF&CS goes back a decade, when local social worker Avraham Friedman spent a sabbatical year in Israel, where he developed a model for social service provision to haredi families.

Last summer, Jerusalem's social services department initiated contact with JF&CS and U of T's social work department to promote a joint venture in the treatment of problems in the haredi community. The university would contribute the research component.

Locally, says JF&CS executive director Gordon Wolfe, problems with youth in ultra-Orthodox families have included violence, eating disorders and trouble arising from the rejection of religious values.

Both Wolfe and Leffler agree that haredi families here and in Israel share many similarities, including a reluctance to reach out for help. And both Toronto and Jerusalem are noticing a growing incidence of reported adolescent behavioral problems in their respective haredi communities.

Some of the issues discussed here included:

- how to deal with clashes between halachah and secular law, as well as professional codes of conduct; and similarly, dealing with the many cultural clashes which would arise;
- how to overcome suspicion and mistrust on the part of haredi families;
- adapting solutions for haredi adolescents which are compatible with their community's lifestyle;
- identifying potential partners in delivery of services, including volunteers, agencies, rabbis and governments;
- monitoring, follow-up and evaluation of programs;
- and examining the possibility of a vocational yeshiva designed for haredi youth who drop out of traditional yeshivot.

Local teacher wins PM award

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO – That old red schoolhouse sure ain't what it used to be. Just ask Sholom Eisenstat, team leader for information and broadbased technology at Don Mills Collegiate Institute.

The 43-year-old Toronto born Eisenstat, together with Tito Faria, created CyberARTS, an integrated arts program that combines computer science, visual arts and communication technology.

So successful is CyberARTS that it led to Don Mills C.I. being awarded the prestigious Prime Minister's Award for Achievement in Education. Faria and Eisenstat plan to use the $1,000 award for scholarships for students who have "used technology with excellence," Eisenstat said.

The Prime Minister's Award for Achievement in Education "honour outstanding elementary and secondary school teachers in all disciplines who best equip their students to meet the challenges of a changing society and knowledge-based economy," according to a media release.

Up to 15 certificates of excellence, which includes a financial award of $5,000 are awarded, along with up to 50 certificates of achievement. This year, 15 excellence and 52 achievement awards were presented.

The two were nominated by Don Mills C.I. principal Miriam Pearlman. "Just being nominated was enough of a compliment," Eisenstat said. "Winning was the icing. We were very proud – it blew us away."

Eisenstat, who was educated at McGill University and the Hebrew University, has taught at Winnipeg's Joseph Wolinsky Collegiate and United Synagogue Day School and CHAT in Toronto. He is visibly excited about CyberARTS.

Sholom Eisenstat

Students, who must apply to take the course, work on a series of projects, using a variety of different technologies. For instance, Eisenstat explained, one project was to design a playground. Students researched the subject in books and on the Internet, prepared drawings, and finished by building a scale model.

In their senior year, Eisenstat said, students compile a portfolio, using physical, digital and video technology. "It teaches that you can't necessarily trust technology. A person might go into a job interview, prepared to show their accomplishments on a video, but find that the office has no video machine, so they have to present a printed document."

The students use this portfolio when applying for the four-day-a-week co-op program in the last semester. "They are much sought after," Eisenstat said, noting that many are hired for summer or part-time jobs.

The students, who work in teams of three or four, decide what tools are best to use for any particular project, such as a website, or a video. They are evaluated in three ways: by themselves, by their peers and by the teachers.

"Our goal is to produce well-educated kids, who can get up and talk about what they have learned," said Eisenstat.

He took particular relish in talking about the school's participation in the G8 conference in 1998 in Birmingham, England. CyberARTS students were invited to represent Canada at a youth summit that paralleled the leaders' conference.

"We established a multi-grade, multi-age, multi-credit course for 60 students," Eisenstat explained. Over the Internet, they polled Canadian youth about what they felt the delegation should talk about. Results were tabulated, issues were extensively researched, and background papers were written.

Four students actually went to the youth conference in Birmingham, accompanied by 15 other students and some teachers. The highlight was a video conference at 5 a.m. Toronto time on a Saturday morning.

"Everyone was [there] but me – it nearly killed me," lamented Eisenstat, who is shomer Shabbat.

Questions were sent from the delegates in England to the Don Mills classroom, and the answers were e-mailed back. "They could see on the video the paper with the answers being handed to the delegates," he said.

Sheva Strolovitch, of the Hebrew Academy in Cote St. Luc, also won a certificate of achievement.

Leadership retreat prepares volunteers for campaign

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

JACKSON'S POINT, ONT. — "It's the stories that get me," said David Weinberg, explaining his commitment to his volunteer leadership role in UJA Federation's Campaign 2000.

One of 125 people to attend an afternoon-long leadership retreat in preparation for this year's campaign, Weinberg, who co-chairs the campaign's fashion division, became involved as a UJA canvasser shortly after his oldest child was born.

At the retreat, held at the cottage of Debbie and Warren Kimel, over half a dozen speakers told compelling stories relating to the three cornerstones of this year's campaign: fortifying Jewish identity, assisting the vulnerable and rescuing Jews in danger.

But the story that spoke most powerfully to Weinberg, as a father of young children, was about a boy whose life was turned around by Orr Shalom Children's Homes, a 20-year-old Israeli non-profit organization, and beneficiary of campaign funds.

Orr Shalom operates a network of "family group homes" run by couples for up to 10 children. The organization has one religious group home and is seeking Bedouin house parents and social workers for Arab children.

The boy whose story touched Weinberg was born to a street prostitute. By the time he entered Orr Shalom's Eilat location (a beneficiary of Toronto community funding), he was a depressed, bitter, neglected and under-achieving 12-year-old, said Haim Feingold, executive director of the organization.

Over five years at Orr Shalom, the youngster made such progress that the IDF recently offered him an opportunity to take preliminary steps toward becoming a pilot.

"We're trying to break the cycle for these kids," said Feingold. All the Orr Shalom children – victims of abuse and neglect – receive therapy, he said. "We try to make them into a mentsch."

Six hundred eighty thousand children in Israel live under the poverty line, he noted. "This is the dark side of the land of milk and honey."

Among the other speakers were Benjamin Ish-Shalom, chair of Israel's Institute for Jewish Studies, which develops and runs conversion programs; Seymour Epstein, new executive director of the Board of Jewish Education; Eric Kirsh, supervisor, special resources, Jewish Family & Child Service (JF&CS); and Clive Lessem, New York-based North American representative of the Jewish Agency for Israel, who discussed Israel's rescue of Jews and non-Jews from Kosovo and Ethiopia.

Kirsh noted that JF&CS is the only registered Jewish children's aid society in North America.

Among its success stories is a family of three siblings who have become crown wards and are "thriving" in a Jewish foster home. "We'll basically grow these kids up," he said. "They'll be raised in the Jewish community."

Such stories "remind us why we do the work we do," said Debbie Kimel, a vice-chair of the campaign.

Ish-Shalom told of a young oleh who represents the problems faced by 360,000 immigrants from the former Soviet Union who are not halachically Jewish.

Ish-Shalom happened to hear the young man's distraught girlfriend on a call-in radio show when he was waiting to hear a news broadcast.

The young couple, who wanted to marry, feared the reaction of her traditional parents should they find out he wasn't Jewish.

The boyfriend, who considered himself a relatively traditional Jew before learning of his halachic status, was devastated after being referred by the rabbinical court to a yeshiva to study for a year before the rabbis would even consider his case.

The story ended happily after Ish-Shalom intervened, with the help of Israel's special conversion court, with which his institute works. (The institute operates under the auspices of the Israeli government and the Jewish Agency for Israel, which is funded by UJA Federation worldwide.)

Ed Segalowitz, UJA Federation's vice-president, planning and allocations, said that despite the range of programming supported by campaign funds, "we still have to do more."

Among the local priorities he cited for which funds are not yet available, were pre-school speech and language testing and respite for caregivers of seniors and special needs children.

Campaign money raised here supports both local and overseas programs. Last year's Toronto campaign raised $40.5 million. A target of $50 million annually, by the end of 2001, has been set.

On the Israeli and international scene, Israelis have become counterparts of Canadian donors. Joe Dushansky discussed the Spirit of Israel campaign, of which he is director general.

The campaign, a Jewish Agency partner, has 39,000 donors in its data base since its inception 18 months ago, Dushansky said.

A side benefit, in addition to the social services the Israeli campaign supports, is to make the Israel-Diaspora relationship more a relationship of equals, he said.

Campaign 2000 will be launched August 30 under the chairmanship of David Engel and Mel Wolfond.

'One of the miracles of the century'

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Benjamin Ish-Shalom calls the goings-on at the recently opened Institute for Jewish Studies "one of the miracles of the century." He may not be far off the mark, given the political and religious realities of life in Israel.

At the low-profile institute's two branches, representatives of all denominations prepare students for conversion to Judaism (to take place under Orthodox auspices). The controversial idea was proposed by the Ne'eman Committee in 1998.

Ish-Shalom, 46, chairs the institute's seven-member board, which includes representatives of Orthodox, Conservative and Reform Judaism.

A soft-spoken academic with a PhD in Jewish Thought from the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, Ish-Shalom has a Hesder yeshiva background, which means he combined yeshiva study with army service.

He was brought to Toronto recently by UJA Federation, which funds the Jewish Agency for Israel. (The institute is a joint project of the Jewish Agency and the Israeli government.)

A fifth-generation Jerusalemite on his mother's side, Ish-Shalom is the founder and rector of Beit Morasha of Jerusalem – The Centre for Advanced Jewish Studies, which trains educational and lay leadership from Israel and the Diaspora.

Ish-Shalom's father, a Holocaust survivor, hebraicized the name Friedmann (German for "man of peace"), on making aliyah.

At Ish-Shalom's suggestion, board members agreed that all decisions be reached by consensus, not voting, to foster co-operation, and avoid a situation whereby the Orthodox members take advantage of being a majority.

"It is a very unique framework," said Ish-Shalom.

Remarkably, it appears to be working. According to Ish-Shalom, there is full respect and trust among the board members.

Thus far, the institute has 35 students in Beersheva, 22 in Karmiel. The one-year course includes Jewish concepts, customs, ideas and values. Teachers and students are all olim from the former Soviet Union, and four more branches are in the works.

Yes, there has been resistance, said Ish-Shalom, but there has also been support. He is optimistic.

"With a little goodwill and a reasonable approach, with a lot of empathy and sympathy, we can solve many, many problems...The common basis we share is much larger than the issues that divide us."

Based on his contacts with Israel's chief rabbis and the rabbinical court system, Ish-Shalom expects to receive co-operation once the institute's students complete their course next year.

Creating a 'common gate' to Judaism

"But you have to understand," he cautioned, "that we cannot force any rabbinical court to decide in advance what will be the result of a particular process. The rabbinical court is a sovereign institution, and should be. We have to respect that. Otherwise there is no meaning to that concept."

Ish-Shalom himself is not a rabbi. A university professor who has taught at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem and as a visiting professor at Yeshiva University, he is troubled by the gaps between Israeli and Diaspora Jewry, and between secular and religious Jews.

When the Israeli government offered him the institute position, he felt he couldn't refuse. "It's a mission, actually. I know the responsibility, and I feel I can fulfil it."

In the past half dozen years, noted Ish-Shalom, Israel has taken in about one million olim from the former Soviet Union. Of those, almost a third – 360,000 people – are not halachically Jewish.

But they are "in fact an integral part of our people," he said. "They suffered in Russia because of their so-called Jewishness. We are responsible for them."

Although he doesn't anticipate institute students will have to adopt the most stringently Orthodox observances to qualify for conversion, Ish-Shalom makes it clear there are expectations incumbent on them.

"To become Jewish means to be committed to something, not to adopt a theoretical set of beliefs. It means to oblige yourself to a certain way of life, to become a full partner in a large family of Jews."

The conversion courts with which he works, which are run under the auspices of the chief rabbinate, treat Russian olim "in a polite and constructive way," Ish-Shalom said.

"They don't raise difficulties that the convert cannot overcome, but they challenge him, of course, and they should. If he wants to join the Jewish people, he should understand that this has some ramifications. [Similarly], if a person wants to become a Canadian citizen, he should meet some criteria.

"We have to make [the convert's] way to Judaism very comfortable, yet responsible...and not prevent him from joining us by creating such difficulties that he cannot overcome."

Ish-Shalom's hope is that he will help break down stereotypes among Jews from different backgrounds, facilitate integration into Israeli Jewish society for institute students, and create "one common gate" to Judaism that will be recognized by all the denominations.

Dry Bones
DON'T THINK OF IT AS TOO MANY MINISTERS IN THE GOVERNMENT
NO?
NO!
THINK OF IT AS THE FIRST STEP IN...
ENDING THE UNEMPLOYMENT PROBLEM.

A helpful stand

On Feb. 9, the United Nations General Assembly convened a rare "emergency special session" to excoriate Israel, once again, over its settlements in the West Bank. The session resulted in the unprecedented decision to call a meeting of the countries that signed the Fourth Geneva Convention, dealing with the protection of civilian populations in times of war, to discuss the situation of the Palestinians under Israel's "occupation" of the West Bank and Gaza.

At the time, we described the Palestinian-inspired procedure as "a transparent attempt to demonize Israel…and…to circumvent the Oslo process." We therefore condemned the government of Canada for supporting the decision.

On July 15, some five months after the vote in the UN, that meeting took place in Geneva. After little more than half an hour, the meeting adjourned; 103 countries attended. Canada did not, because it considered the conference "unhelpful to the peace process."

We commend the government of Canada for essentially reversing its originally flawed decision and for taking a stand that was, indeed, helpful to the peace process.

The juxtaposition of poignant opposites

Sometimes, through the unanticipated juxtaposition of life's poignant opposites, we are able to edge a little bit closer to an insight about our own lives, about all life. For example, the famous image of the final farewell salute by tiny 3-year-old John Kennedy to the coffin that bore the body of his murdered father, was a juxtaposition of poignant opposites. The youngster, barely more than a toddler, standing at attention – so adult, so composed – was caught in a larger grief that he could not possibly understand.That image was like the adjusted focus on a camera lens; it helped us see a fuller dimension of the assassination in Dallas.

Tragically, that 3-year-old boy was destined to live only to the age of 39. Though we in Canada are more removed from the tragedy than our American neighbors, we are not so removed as to fail to notice these very sad juxtaposed opposites: a good, decent and promising life that ended "unfairly," unfulfilled, far too soon.

In truth, the juxtaposition of poignant opposites is ubiquitous.

We can see them, for example, in God's infinite signatures everywhere in the world, as well as in man's infinite attempts everywhere in the world, either to seek or to abjure God: perhaps a spectacular sunset, purple, mauve and crimson, inevitably retreating into the far horizon at the end of a day; or a slow-moving, sleepy river coursing deep and fresh through uncut rock; a child stricken with terminal illness; war.

But most of the time, we rarely notice.

That is why when we do, such as with the terrible crash into the ocean last week of John Kennedy, his wife Carolyn and her sister Lauren Bessette, we stop to catch our breath and to reflect, at least for the moment, upon the deeper truths of our own and of all existence.

Writers defend courteousness of young people

With regard to Rabbi Gunther Plaut's comments in "Rise for the aged" (CJN July 8), re the lack of courtesy on the part of young people and people in general today, I too am a senior and caregiver. My husband had a stroke a number of years ago and now walks with a walker.

I am totally amazed at how considerate and courteous the young, the old and in between, have been.

They never fail to run to hold open a door, they get up from their seats to offer assistance, move chairs out of the way, etc.

This group of people consist of the scruffy teens to the well dressed middle class.

It has given me a new insight into how helpful and considerate people really are.

My husband and I travelled alone recently in Prague and Budapest, spending a great deal of time on the subway systems of both cities. One of the things that made a great impression on us was the fact that upon barely passing through the doors of the subway car, a young person would immediately stand up and offer us their seat, not once or twice, but without fail, every time. At first we were concerned and laughed to one another that perhaps we looked old and decrepit, only to realize that this was to be the norm. We asked our hosts in Prague whether the young people were taught this respect in school, and his answer was that this was simply proper upbringing and that children are taught respect for their elders at home.

Likes choices available to Orthodox girls

I object to the tone of Leila Speisman's discussion (CJN July 15) of Orthodox girls' education, which I found unnecessarily bleak. In fact, it is a tribute to the seriousness with which Orthodox parents regard their children's education that so many choices are available. Speisman sees the variety of options as a sign of division in the community, and appears critical of the more conservative approaches. Why not see the diversity for what it is, an indicator of healthy growth.

Objects to rabbi's endorsement of candidate

It was reported (CJN, June 10), that during the recent Ontario provincial election, Rabbi Solomon Domb of B'nai Shalom North Synagogue issued an open letter to hundreds of Thornhill residents in support of the Conservative party candidate (Tina Molinari). I object to the rabbi's conduct.

The rabbi of a congregation should refrain from issuing public letters in support of any one candidate or political party. It causes offence to many members of the congregation when their rabbi uses his high office to assist the campaign of only one candidate.

Jewish leader evacuated because of KLA

I would like to comment on the news about the Jewish leader evacuated from Kosovo. (CJN, July 8)

North American Jews, geared towards condemnation of the Serbian people responsible for the policies conducted in Kosovo, stumble when they have to face the reality of the relationship between Jews in Yugoslavia and the Serbian people.

Chedar Prlincevic had to be evacuated as a result of the vacuum caused by withdrawal of Serbian police. The rogue para-military group of Albanians (I assume, as it is not mentioned in the article) represented a threat to the Jewish leader of Kosovo. I know, in politics morality is universal, and it is always better to be in position of someone who protects universal rights from a long distance, or somewhere up in the sky.

The fact is that on the ground, we as Jews from the Balkans, see history repeating itself. Serbs, Gypsies and Jews had to flee Kosovo or perish once the Kosovo Liberation Army ruled this region.

Radical Muslims bogged down in internal fights

By DOUGLAS DAVIS
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

If ideologies were tradable commodities, panic orders would be going out to sell Islamic radicalism.

As Middle East leaders contemplate the political landscape – after the Israeli elections and before the start of the U.S. presidential campaign – they detect a small window of opportunity to surge ahead with peace talks.

And Islamic extremist movements – for the moment, at least – are being perceived as part of the problem rather than the solution.

Thus, when Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Barak and Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat met at the Erez crossing between the Gaza Strip and Israel last week, their encounter focused on the single most important issue in the peace-making business: security.

Among aides who attended the meeting were Danny Yatom, former Mossad director and now Barak's chief of staff, and Arafat's intelligence chief, Mohammed Dahlan.

Yatom outlined the latest Israeli intelligence assessment of Hamas; Dahlan confirmed its accuracy.

At least some of Yatom's analysis was based on data derived from an intercepted message between Tehran-based Hamas military leader Imad al-Alami and Hamas military leaders in the territories.

Both Yatom and Dahlan agreed that Hamas is deeply divided between the advocates of "violence now," led by the external leadership of Hamas, Alami and the Amman-based Hamas political bureau chief Khaled Meshal, and the advocates of "prudence now," representing the internal leadership, led by Hamas founder Sheik Ahmed Yassin.

Deep as the divisions are, however, sources do not expect the dispute to split Hamas, which is also riven by accusations of embezzlement and internal corruption.

Quite simply, they say, the message reaching the West Bank and Gaza from their Iranian patrons is "moderation."

Other pressures are also bearing down on the Islamic radicals: Hamas is feeling the heat in Jordan, where its political base appears to be increasingly shaky, while Iran has served notice on Hezbollah that it must prepare to disarm and join Lebanon's political mainstream.

Jordan, which has in the past used its patronage of Hamas as a lever against Arafat, was last week reported to be cracking down on the movement as a prelude to a complete shutdown of its activities in the kingdom.

Jordanian sources say the government is expected to end the organization's "political presence" within a matter of days, ostensibly because it suspects that Hamas is becoming deeply involved "in the Jordan arena" – but also, no doubt, as a gesture to Barak.

The main targets of the crackdown are understood to be Khaled Meshal, the most senior Hamas political official in Jordan – and the subject of a botched Mossad assassination bid last year – and Hamas spokesman Mohammed Nazzal. Both men were abroad last week.

According to the sources, the Jordanian authorities are concerned that the Amman-based political leadership of Hamas is threatening the Muslim Brotherhood in Jordan, another Islamist group militantly opposed to Israel's existence.

First steps aimed at inhibiting the activities of the organization have included rounding up several key Hamas activists and pulling others in for questioning.

The crackdown was apparently triggered by the mysterious emergence of a statement – signed Hamas Cadres in Amman – which was circulated in the Jordanian capital last week.

The statement contained a scathing attack on Hamas' political bureau, which it accused of attempting to take over Jordan's Muslim Brotherhood, and of conspiring against the internal Hamas leadership, particularly Yassin.

The statement also accused the Hamas "clique" in Jordan of using dirty tricks in its bid to seize control of the brotherhood.

Israel's Prime Minister Ehud Barak met last week with King Abdullah of Jordan. The subject of security arrangements was undoubtedly on their agenda. [Israel Sun photo]

These tricks included leaks to the media about internal disputes, bogus statements in the name of brotherhood officials designed to embarrass the leadership, and attempts to incite members of the brotherhood against their executive bureau.

The Hamas leadership has declined to comment on this attack, but the sources confirm that brotherhood leaders recently took steps to sever their organizational ties with Hamas.

In Tehran, meanwhile, Iranian authorities have told Hezbollah spiritual leader Hassan Nasrallah that the countdown to the movement's demilitarization is already under way.

A cover story in the Arabic-language al-Majalla this week quoted senior sources close to the Iranian government as saying Nasrallah was told that Hezbollah must start preparing for a purely political role after Israel leaves Lebanon.

The London-based, Saudi-owned newsweekly said a close aide to Iranian President Mohammad Khatami had told the Hezbollah leader that Tehran and Damascus will assist the movement's transition from an ideological militia to a conventional party that is integrated into Lebanese political life.

Khatami is reported to have already started reducing arms supplies to Hezbollah and funding for its military operations. Instead, he has increased financial aid to Hezbollah's educational, cultural and welfare programs, which form the foundations of the movement's political support.

Still quoting its Iranian sources, al-Majalla reported that Syria is now closely scrutinizing Iranian arms shipments passing through Damascus en route to Lebanon. And it noted that Syrian officials have recently blocked the transfer of heavy weapons and rockets to Hezbollah.

In a separate interview with the newsweekly, Hezbollah's political bureau head Mohammad Ra'ad hinted that his movement would not impede any decisions taken by Beirut and Damascus in negotiations with Israel.

But he cautioned that the mere start of negotiations between Israel and Syria will not be enough to persuade Hezbollah to halt its military campaign against Israeli forces in south Lebanon.

"The resumption of negotiations does not necessarily mean that agreements are ready for signing," said Ra'ad, a member of the Lebanese Parliament.

"Indeed, resistance operations against the Zionist occupation need to be continued and escalated, "he said. "Experience has shown that they have been effective in undermining and weakening the enemy."

While maintaining Hezbollah's deliberately ambiguous line about its posture in the event of an Israeli pullout from south Lebanon, Ra'ad indicated that the movement would act pragmatically.

When Israel withdraws from Lebanon, "Hezbollah will consider its operational methods in light of changes and developments.

"There is no need to pre-empt things now," he added. "Hezbollah will act in accordance with its assessment of the interests of Lebanon and the Lebanese – and of the special relationship with Syria."

All signs indicate that, with peace in the air, the Islamic radicals are being squeezed and their sources of logistical support are drying up. Equally, however, all bets are off if the revived peace talks falter.

Hamas terrorists are being trained in Iranian camp

By ZE'EV SCHIFF
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Iran has begun training Hamas terrorists in an exclusive training camp, Shin Bet has discovered. The camp, located not far from Tehran, is run by Pasdaran (Islamic Revolutionary Guards) units, under the control of the conservative, clerical leader Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, and has nothing to do with the regular Iranian army.

Shin Bet became aware of the Iranian-Hamas connection several months ago, following its arrest of three Hamas terrorists returning from abroad. Two of them were from the Gaza area, and one from the West Bank.

During the course of their interrogation, the three admitted that they had received guerrilla warfare training in Iran, and had, upon completion of their training, returned home to begin operations. The three men are still under arrest, and are awaiting trial at the Israeli Gaza military court.

The Iranian-Hamas link is a new development, since the movement has until now kept Iran at arm's length, fearing to compromise its independence. The smaller and more radical Islamic Jihad movement has been co-operating with Iran for some time, and has received funding and training from that country.

The fact that Iran has begun training Hamas fighters is a further escalation of Iranian involvement in the planning and carrying out of terror attacks against Israel.

Hamas is currently the largest and most dangerous terror organization operating in Israel, and targets both Israeli civilians and military personnel. It is vehemently opposed to the peace process, and over the past several years has carried out several bloody suicide bombing attacks, targeting buses, major open-air markets and malls.

Hezbollah still remains Iran's main ally in the region. Iran has nurtured this organization ever since its inception, following Israel's 1982-84 invasion and subsequent occupation of southern and central Lebanon.

Iran supplies Hezbollah with all its funding, arms, logistical and training requirements. The latter includes basic and advanced training of junior and senior commanders, and a wide range of professional military training including sabotage, communications, guerrilla warfare and other key military skills.

The training camps used to be in Lebanon itself, but were relocated to Iran following the deaths of several Pasdaran personnel in IAF bombing attacks on their camps in Lebanon. Most of the supplies are flown to Syrian airports, and from there transferred to Hezbollah units in Lebanon.

All these activities, including the training camps in Iran, are under the complete control of the Pasdaran, which answers not to the government, but solely to the country's conservative clerical leadership headed by the Ayatollah Ali Khamenei.

The camp at which Hamas terrorists were trained has also been used to train Balkan Islamic fighters.

On being a refugee again

I was a refugee once. Though that experience happened more than 60 years ago, it became fresh and painful once again when I visited Kosovo refugees in a Canadian holding centre.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

Camp Borden, an army post near Barrie, received us unlike any military installation I had ever seen. From the moment we arrived, we never saw a single soldier. It was at first difficult to know that this was not another housing development with the usual mix of people. But after a while, I knew that I was elsewhere. I saw lots of older people and children, but few younger men; war and ethnic cleansing had left their mark. Camp Borden's calm atmosphere could not hide the past altogether.

The children seemed to adapt themselves to their environment. They shouted "Hi!" at us, and did so with enthusiasm. Their linguistic education was evidently well on its way, and their friendliness was a sign of saying "thank you." Being the recipient of such gratitude, and not from children only, made me feel both happy and awkward.

We were also struck by the way these children behaved. They were polite, restrained and orderly. They stood in line at chow time without pushing. Was this due to their upbringing or to the environment in which we saw them? I'd like to think it was the former.

We were interviewing adults with the help of interpreters, though sometimes these were not required, the interviewees being able to converse in understandable and often expert English. We learned that they came from different backgrounds: professionals, manual laborers, business people, and all too few students. Did they hope to go back to Kosovo? Many said yes, while some wanted to wait and see how things would turn out back home. "Not yet," some answered. "Still too many land mines" said others. I remembered suddenly that such were my own feelings when I had escaped from the Nazis. I too, had needed to wait and see whether the insanity that had engulfed the German people would soon run its course and allow me to go back.

Learning to live in a foreign environment and making peace with one's displacement takes years. Like many of the people at Camp Borden, I too had not been sure where members of my family were. When I was being married in Cincinnati, my dad was in hiding somewhere in Berlin; and I did not rediscover whereabouts of uncles and cousins until years later.

Those charged with making life bearable at Camp Borden deserve our commendation and admiration. Phil Norrad, regional manager of Canada's immigration services, like his staff and the volunteers of the Canadian Red Cross, finds the work with Kosovars rewarding. "Our government has indicated that Kosovar refugees will generally qualify for permanent residence in Canada." Good for us – we have learned from our dreadful mishandling of the Jewish refugee problem in the '30s and '40s. Never again "one is too many, he says."

I learned a good deal about myself when I visited Camp Borden. My own memories of once having been a refugee were more alive than I had anticipated. I came as a visitor and left as a onetime refugee.

The exhaustion of summer counselling

I am very tired. I wish I could claim that my lethargic nature is the result of staying up until the wee hours of morn. Alas, it is not. My sleepiness is due to 60 young adults I face five days a week at the day camp where I work.

Jennifer Fox in Thornhill

The last time I attended camp I was 15 and going into Grade 10. The following year I didn't leave the world of summer camp, but switched sides from camper to counsellor and have remained there for the last six years.

The camp counsellor is a peculiar position. You're expected to entertain, teach, and discipline without having the you-must-respect-me persona adults possess. Sometimes my campers hang on my every word, but more often than not I could vanish into air and they wouldn't even notice.

Most people can name their counsellors from years of day and overnight camps. This puzzles me, as I can't recall a single one of my numerous day camp counsellors. The counsellors from my two years at Northland B'nai Brith in Haliburton, Ont., are all a blur and the staff from my three years at Camp Kadimah in Nova Scotia, have begun to fade.

For me camp is what you do, not who you're with. I may not remember who it was who tried to teach me to water-ski, but I do recall the feeling of my arms being pulled from their sockets and the boat dragging me across the water, because I didn't know to let go.

I'm not sure what her name was, but I remember walking for two hours with a heavy backpack bearing down on me before the trip leader scratched her head and declared, "We must have taken a wrong turn somewhere, let's walk back to camp."

This is what I hope I leave to the 200 kids I will see over the months of July and August – a memory of action. I doubt they'll remember me, as I won't remember all of them. I want them to take away a memory of something they did in the two weeks I was their counsellor.

Doing is the reason why I'm always so tired during the summer. It takes a lot of energy to survive the demands of kids for seven hours a day. When I come home exhausted, my friends comment that perhaps having kids of my own is beyond my capabilities. I reply, however, the trick is not to have 10 kids of the same age at the same time.

Each year brings a new batch of kids and with them I'm exposed to a new fashion or musical trend of the younger set. There is one constant, however. Every year there's the popular boys and girls that everyone flocks to, the troublemakers who drive both counsellors and campers nuts, and the misfits who stick together and don't quite mesh with anyone else.

Some days I'll see the shy girl sitting off to the side by herself and instantly I'm once again the scared kid who stepped off the bus for the first time and couldn't find a familiar face in sight. For two months every year, I relive bits of my childhood. This doesn't happen with most jobs and I'm not sure if it's a blessing or a curse.

I am fairly certain the summer of '99 will be the last time I work at day camp. The idea of being 22 years old and still at camp doesn't appeal to me. Next summer I plan to take a vacation, or enroll in a few summer courses in an exotic locale, or perhaps I'll take a job that's somehow connected with news media.

The next time I want to think about summer camp is when I send my own kids off for the day into the hands of some sleep-deprived teenager.

Camp is part of fantasy life

As my 13-year-old campers prepare for the first summer Friday night services which they will lead, I rehearse my parts, paying close attention to the words I will utter.

Erica Horn in Montreal

Our theme is creation – the beginning. Just as in the book of Bereshit God created the world in six days and on the seventh He rested, at both the time of the writing of this column and the first Friday night services, we have been at camp for a week and it is time for us to ponder over the beginning of our summer and our first days in our summer home.

We have started the creation of new friendships, new memories and new experiences. However, beginnings are often quite challenging. Prior to my departure I worried over many things: Will I have good campers? What will there be to eat? Will I receive all the privileges I had hoped for?

At the same time, however, I was excited about the opportunities and possibilities which lay ahead.

My camp routine is one of intense and continuous physical activity combined with the devouring of fried foods, Sloppy Joes and bug juice.

Upon my return from Camp Green Lane, on Green Lane Road, in Green Lane, Pa., I normalize my diet, know I must lose the American accent, wake up at a more decent hour and then elect to mope around the house and the city for weeks — missing my camp friends. It seems that beginnings are equally as, if not more difficult than endings.

This past year I applied for numerous internships in the United States in the field of journalism, and for jobs as a madricha on various trips to Israel. I felt I had grown too old for camp. My friends were moving on to bigger and better things – volunteering in hospitals and labs, interning at accounting and law firms, studying for MCATs, LSATs and GREs.

Camp seemed part of a fantasy life. The moment you arrive the rest of the world stops, world crises and affairs disappear – you are lost in time, lost in space. Sunday is Tuesday, midnight is morning and the island of Montreal could drift south of Brazil and we really wouldn't have a clue.

As isolated as we may be at camp, and as much as we would like to believe that having 56 consecutive days where the goal is to have fun are all part of a fantasy and surrealistic world, camp belongs more to the reality.

The horrors of Kosovo which mirror the atrocities of the Holocaust, John F. Kennedy Jr.'s plane gone missing which added further misfortune and tragedy to the Kennedy family name – these things should be the surreal, the unbelievable, the fantasy and not camp.

In hindsight, I realize that my camp-related worries were comparatively trivial to other situations I could be faced with. Moreover, I have learnt that you are never too old for camp – you will have the rest of your life to pursue your career.

My pre-camp jitters only served as gradual preparation for potential adversities.

As it is written, God created the world in six days and on the seventh He rested.

IT'S ALL IN THE SHOULDERS!

The Kirshner File

The Jews of the Mississippi delta

The fertile delta region of Mississippi, in the northwestern corner of that quintessential southern American state, is a paradigm of the Old South, what with its archetypical plantations and its vast expanse of cotton fields.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Always isolated, the delta is almost as remote today as it was when that peculiar institution, slavery, was in vogue. Not even an interstate highway runs through it.

And yet the delta, one of the poorest regions in the United States, a place that inspires jokes about rednecks, has a well-established Jewish community, albeit a declining one.

Six years ago, Mike DeWitt, a neophyte filmmaker from Beverly Hills, Calif., decided to make a documentary about the Jews there. The film, Delta Jews, which had its world premiere at the New York Jewish Film Festival last January, was screened at the recent Toronto Jewish Film Festival.

"Mississippi," he explained, "was a part of the United States I didn't know, and it intrigued me."

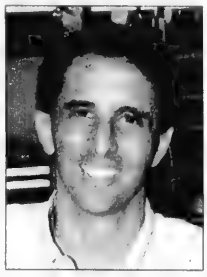
One can understand his sentiments. In the popular imagination, Mississippi has invariably summoned up the spectre of unbridled racism, of Jim Crow laws and of Ku Klux Klan cross burnings. Mississippi, like the rest of the South, has changed for the better in the past three decades, but the stereotypes linger on.

It was into this terrain that DeWitt boldly ventured, first as an English teacher for the Mississippi Teacher Corps in the delta town of Greenwood, and then as the producer and director of Delta Jews, the first and so far only movie about this arcane subject.

With funding from various sources, including the Skirball Cultural Centre in Los Angeles and the Mississippi Humanities Council, DeWitt drove around the delta, on and off for 5½ years starting in 1992, interviewing Jews in towns like Greenwood, Indianola, Cleveland, Clarksdale and Vicksburg.

He shot his first scene at the eighth annual Jewish Delta Open, an amateur golf tournament in Greenwood. The sheer unusualness and camaraderie of that event convinced DeWitt, 32, that there was a film to be made about the Jews of the delta.

There was a certain urgency in the project. "It was clear that this was not the kind of film you could make 10 years down the road," said DeWitt. The Jewish population of the delta is down precipitously, from 1,500 in 1945 to 300 today.



Mike DeWitt

Originally from Western Europe, the first Jewish settlers were itinerant peddlers who eventually bought stores and became respectable merchants. A few, like third-generation cotton farmer Ben Lamensdorf, remained on the land.

The Jews of the delta found almost complete acceptance from their Christian neighbors. "They were integrated into local society," said DeWitt, who is Jewish. "They wanted to be part of it. They avoided situations that would set them apart from that society. They were Jews and Southerners."

Anti-Semitism hardly affected them. "Jews assimilated aggressively," said DeWitt. "Besides, they were not there in any great numbers, and were regarded as good citizens."

Nevertheless, the fear of anti-Semitism loomed large. The tumultuous civil rights era of the 1950s and 1960s unleashed hidden prejudices and resentments, prompting Jews to feel vulnerable and, perhaps, marginal. Certainly, they did not appreciate the presence of Jewish civil rights activists from the north in their communities.

According to DeWitt, Jews generally kept a low profile and "went along," acquiescing to the prevailing system of segregation. Indeed, some even joined the White Citizens Councils, which sought to perpetuate it. One of its Jewish members wrote a racist pamphlet entitled A Jewish View of Segregation.

"As I made the film, I wondered what I would have done under these circumstances," said DeWitt, who is currently working on a series of programs about American history for Home Box Office. "I hope I would have had the guts to stand against injustice."

Although relatively few Jews, including rabbis, publicly denounced segregation, they tended to be more civil than white gentiles in their day-to-day relations with African-Americans. And they were not as reluctant to give blacks non-menial jobs.

DeWitt is pleased to report that Delta Jews – which was shown at the University of Mississippi in Oxford and broadcast on the public educational TV station in Jackson – went down well with the Jews he had interviewed. "They seemed very proud of the film, and this is to their credit because not everything in it is particularly flattering. They said that I got their story right, and this is endlessly satisfying for me."

Racism in South Africa

Institutional racism was the coin of the realm before South Africa finally abandoned apartheid and metamorphosed into a multi-racial democracy. And while non-whites bore the brunt of racist attitudes and practices, South African Jews were hardly immune to its evils.

That, in a nutshell, is the theme of Milton Shain's illuminating book, The Roots of Anti-Semitism in South Africa (University of Virginia Press), whose focus is the late 19th and early 20th centuries.

Shain's thesis is that anti-Semitism was an important, though not a defining, element of South African society long before anti-Semitism peaked in the 1930s. The substantial involvement of Jews in trade and speculation in the diamond fields and in the hinterland had aroused the resentment of both Afrikaners and Britons, he writes.

By the 1890s, Jewish traders, particularly those of East European origin, were increasingly seen as exploiters. However, German Jews, who comprised the leadership of the Jewish community until this century, were generally exempt from this stereotype.

The presence of East European Jews in South Africa troubled many whites. They viewed the newcomers as unassimilable, looking askance at their dishevelled appearance, exotic language (Yiddish) and alien manner. But as they adapted themselves to their new surroundings, the distinctions between them and the acculturated German-Jewish establishment faded.

Shain points out that Jewish thrift, enterprise and energy were respected. But he hastens to add that anti-Semitic stereotypes flourished in the popular press.

After the 1917 Bolshevik revolution, Jews were identified with Communism. This was certainly a problem, but a minor one compared to the growing backlash against immigration. As a result of an economic depression in Lithuania – the primary source of Jewish settlers – and restrictive changes in the policies of the United States and Australia, the number of Jewish immigrants to South Africa more than doubled in the 1920s.

Reacting to the influx, the South African government in 1930 passed the Immigration Quota Bill. It stifled the inflow of Jewish migrants.

In closing, Shain claims that anti-Semitism was never "a defining feature" of South African culture. Indeed, the prevalence of anti-Semitism did not prevent Jews from achieving prominence in business, politics and the arts. And more importantly, the white status of Jews was never seriously questioned or threatened.

Tu B'Av means romance

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

This week we observe one of the less known but fascinating Jewish holidays, Tu B'Av. After finishing the Three weeks of semi-mourning, it's now time for consolation and rejoicing. And in an interesting convergence of old and new, this ancient holiday period has become a popular time for singles' events. Today, Tu B'Av and romance on the Jewish Highway.

The Mishnah (Ta'anit 4:8), surprisingly enough, declares, "There were no greater holidays (yamim tovim) for Israel than Tu B'Av and Yom Kippur, for on them, the girls of Jerusalem used to go out in borrowed white dresses...and dance in the vineyards. What would they say? 'Young man, lift up your eyes and see what you choose for yourself. Do not set your eyes on beauty but set them on good family. Grace is deceitful and beauty is vain. But a woman that fears God, she will be praised...'" [http://www1.snunit.k12.il/kodesh/mishna/tani04.html].

But why now? According to the Talmud, there are six reasons Tu B'Av was made a holiday [http://www.torah.org/learning/yomtov/3weeks/]. Among them: Marriage between different tribes of Israel was permitted that day. In the desert, a ban on inter-tribal marriage had insured that land would not pass out of the hands of the tribe it originally belonged to.

According to Virtual Jerusalem, "The ability for all of the tribes to marry each other – necessary to facilitate a deep, fundamental sense of Jewish oneness – is worth celebrating." [http://www.vjholidays.com/tubav/backgnd.htm].

In honor of Tu B'Av, Jewish Family & Life asked couples how they keep romance alive in their marriage [http://www.jewishlove.com/]. The same site also held a contest asking people to tell their Jewish love stories. The contest is now closed but you can still read (and share) your own romantic tale. Like the story of Carol and Abie who had known each other for 20 years but only really got to know each other one special summer. Then one day, while Abie was driving home, "he called on the cell phone and said, 'you think we should get married?' That was my romantic proposal. What he may lack in originality, he makes up in sensitivity, support, caring, understanding and affection, and it has been the best year of our lives." [http://www.jewishfamily.com/scripts/newjfl/forum/forum.asp?ForumID=200].

Not too good with words but still want to express your feelings? Since Tu B'Av falls on the 15th of the month, there is always a (romantic) full moon out. Jill Suzanne Jacobs has instructions for building a mobile full of Jewish symbols to complement the holiday [http://jewishfamily.com/scripts/NewJfl/paper/Article.asp?ArticleID=2300].

And for more thoughts on the day, see [http://www.jewishfamily.com/scripts/NewJfl/paper/Index.asp?ColumnID=71].

But what about that pairing of Tu B'Av and Yom Kippur? According to Yosef Abramowitz and Rabbi Susan Silverman, it says a lot about Judaism's unique perspective on relationships [http://jewishfamily.com/scripts/NewJfl/paper/Article.asp?ArticleID=1270].

Tu B'Av, like Yom Kippur, is about introspection and new beginnings concerning our relationships and personal values. On Tu B'Av, the young girls would borrow white dresses so that the young men could not choose among them according to materialistic concerns. Today, we live in a world that is status- and fashion-conscious with ideals of beauty set by television and movies.

"Tu B'Av tells us to look beneath the surface when looking for (or at) a life partner, just as Yom Kippur forces us to look deep into ourselves before God grants us life anew. Like Yom Kippur, it is a time for reflection and introspection. But instead of being an individual process, it is a mutual, shared experience between two people."

Next week, dating and dating advice on the Web.

Lord's Prayer is Jewish

Books
Bernard Baskin

In recent years, courts in Ontario, Manitoba and British Columbia have ruled that recitation of the Lord's Prayer in public schools interferes with the religious-freedom provisions in provincial human rights codes and the national Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

Now the question has arisen in Saskatchewan, where a group of parents who are objecting to the recitation of the prayer have filed a complaint with the province's human rights tribunal. At the heart of the problem is the Saskatchewan Provincial Act of 1905, which dictates that religion be part of the public school system. And religion, of course, almost a century ago meant Christianity.

Many people are upset. Isn't the Lord's Prayer ecumenical in spirit? How can anyone object to its universal teachings and ideals?

The Lord's Prayer, part of the Sermon on the Mount, is the only prayer that Jesus authorized. According to the version in the Book of Matthew, Jesus instructed his followers to pray in this manner. "Our Father Who art in heaven, Hallowed be Thy Name. Thy kingdom come, Thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven. Give us this day our daily bread, and forgive us our debts, as we also have forgiven out debtors. And lead us not into temptation, But deliver us from evil. For Thine is the kingdom and the power and the glory forever."

This simple and succinct prayer was meant to be recited in private. Jesus urges his disciples and followers, "When you pray, go into your room and shut your door and pray to your father who is in secret; and your father who sees in secret will reward you."

Evidently, this was a prayer meant to be intimate and inward-directed, in contrast to public prayer. It was in the vernacular Aramaic tongue in which the common folk were fluent. It is possible it was meant as a protest against fixed, statutory public prayer in general.

How Jewish is the Lord's Prayer? The well-known Christian source, the Interpreter's Bible concludes: "The prayer is thoroughly Jewish and nearly every phrase is paralleled in the Kaddish and the Eighteen Benedictions of the Jewish liturgy. Thus it is Jesus' inspired and original summary of his own people's piety at its best."

Many scholars, Jewish and non-Jewish, have traced almost every idea and formulation in the Lord's Prayer to earlier biblical and rabbinic sources.

In his scholarly study, Jesus and the Judaism of His Time, Irving Zeitlin of the University of Toronto makes clear some of the parallels. "Our Father who art in heaven" is a popular expression which is part of many Jewish prayers. In the Kaddish, we find the words, "may the Name be hallowed and may Thy kingdom come. Exalted and sanctified be His great Name in the world which He created ac-

Roots & Remembrance

Some lost tribes resurface

By ZE'EV GLICENSTEIN

Recently published in hardcover, Jews In Places You Never Thought Of, edited by Karen Primack (Ktav, $29.50 US) reminds us that the Jewish family tree includes many diverse and exotic branches.

Ever heard of the Chuetas of Majorca and other islands off the Mediterranean coast of Spain? Outwardly Catholic, they are considered descendants of hidden Jews who were expelled from Spain in 1492. Their religious practices reflect many Judaic elements. For instance, they fast on Yom Kippur and pray to a deity called Adonai.

And how about the Jews of Sao Tome and Principe, two island nations off the Guinea coast of central Africa? When Portugal expelled its Jews in 1496, the king ordered 2,000 Jewish children to be taken from their parents and sent to these fever- and crocodile-infested islands, which Portugal wanted to colonize. Stories tell of how parents beseeched their children to intermarry and to remain loyal to the laws of Moses.

One year later, only 600 of the child slaves were still alive. Today, their descendants are a distinct minority (recognizable by their white skins) in the islands' population of about 100,000 mostly Creole inhabitants. Efforts are under way, both in Sao Tome and in Israel, to document the roots of this stranded Judaic tribe and reintegrate them into the Jewish mainstream.

While in Thailand several years ago, I visited a Karens hill tribe in a remote mountain village north of Chiang Mai, near the Burmese border. I found a people living in semi-squalid conditions, living in huts and cooking with fire. Electricity had only recently enhanced their rugged agriculturalist way of life.

Unlike neighboring tribes of more recent vintage, the Karens had supposedly been nomads in these mountains since ancient times. They number several millions throughout Burma, Laos and Thailand. According to Jews In Places You Never Thought Of, they have Jewish roots and may be connected to the B'nei Menashe or Shinlung, another Judaic tribe in northeast India that also numbers in the millions.

Comprised of chapters from about 45 contributors, Jews In Places You Never Thought Of is co-published by Kulanu, a U.S.-based non-profit organization that assists obscure Jewish tribes and gentile peoples attracted to Judaism to learn more about being Jewish, convert halachically if necessary, and make aliyah if desired.

Encountering a group of Inca natives from Peru who had been following the path of Judaism since 1966, Kulanu assisted nearly 300 of them through a beit din conversion and immigration to Israel. Kulanu has also assisted the Abayudaya, a group of native Ugandans who have been practicing Judaism since 1919. Having helped 41 B'nei Menashe to resettle in Israel, Kulanu is pressing Israel's chief rabbinate and Ministry of Interior to accept more.

The book asks questions about many other groups of people in South Africa, Ghana, Nigeria, Italy, Mexico, Brazil, Cape Verde and China. It offers an occasionally fascinating, if somewhat uneven, collection of articles. The e-mail address of Kulanu is: Kulanu@ubmail.ubalt.edu. The Jews of Khazaria, by Kevin Alan Brook (Jason Aronson Inc., $35 US) focuses on the Eastern European tribe that embraced Judaism in the 9th century. In this full-fledged academic study, Brook traces the migration of the Khazar people in Hungary, Ukraine and other areas of Europe, and attempts to demonstrate several points that some historians may find contentious.

First, Brook asserts that a large number of the Khazar people converted to Judaism – not just the rulers and nobility. He points out that "many synagogues and yeshivas were established in Khazaria, and the study of Torah and Talmud became commonplace."

Second, the author attempts to show that the Khazars mixed with Slavs and Middle-Eastern Jews, and later intermarried with the Yiddish-speaking Ashkenazi Jews of Eastern Europe.

Also of interest is a new edition of Joan Roland's The Jewish Communities of India: Identity in a Colonial Era (Transaction Books, $29.95 US). Roland gives a thoughtful, detailed history of the Bene Israel community of western India, the Baghdadi Jews of Bombay and Calcutta, and the Cochin Jews of the Malabar Coast.

'Improper to recite prayer' cording to His will, and may He bring about His kingdom."

The phrase, "Thy will be done as in heaven, so on earth," appears in rabbinic literature. The expression, "Give us this day our daily bread," is found in a similar form in the Hebrew scriptures. In the Shemoneh Esreh prayer (Eighteen Benedictions), "Forgive us our debts" is the sixth blessing.

The phrase, "lead us not into temptation," occurs in a talmudic prayer: "Lead us not into sin or iniquity or temptation."

The closing sentence of the prayer is a later addition, probably taken from the Book of Chronicles, where the chronicler has King David speak these words: "Yours Jehovah is the greatness and the power and the glory and the splendor and the majesty."

It would be unfair and misguided to regard the Lord's Prayer, however, as totally derivative and unoriginal. Joseph Klausner, the eminent Jewish scholar, asserted that Jesus condensed and concentrated important Jewish ethical teachings in a unique manner. "The choice and grouping of the phrases is original and the entire prayer conveys the aura of a singular emphasis."

The Jewish objection to the recitation of the Lord's Prayer is not based so much on what it says, but rather on its origin and the status it has achieved throughout the centuries in Christianity. It is the universal Christian prayer and is closely associated with a distinct history and liturgy. It would be improper for Jews to recite it in the classroom or elsewhere.

Apostasy and the right of Jewish burial

By RABBI
J. IMMANUEL SCHOCHET

Recently the media covered a controversy about the burial of a man born Jewish but converted to Christianity, who wished to be buried in a Jewish cemetery.

Guest Voices

The family and friends of the deceased argued that as a "Messianic Jew" he retained Jewish identity and his body should be allowed to rest among Jews. Our community rightly rejected this claim.

The issue created some confusion, even among Jews, because of our principle that a Jew remains a Jew regardless of what he does or fails to do. Thus some clarification is in order.

The Talmud states unequivocally: An Israelite, though he sinned, remains an Israelite. Maimonides thus writes in his famous Epistle to Yemen: "No descendant of Jacob [the patriarch] can ever free himself from this Torah, neither he, nor his children or children's children, whether voluntarily or involuntarily. Nonetheless, he will be punished for negating any of its commands or violating any of its prohibitions."

Rabbi Shlomo Yitzchaki (Rashi) uses this principle as the premise for ruling that even apostates are regarded Jewish in matters of marital and other laws. He is followed in this by most authorities, including the Code of Jewish Law.

Many people, however, miss a crucial point. The inclusiveness of the apostate is only in the negative context of imposing legal stringencies (chumrot), and not to favor him with status or legal leniencies.

One could simply summarize the status of the apostate in the following words: The heretic or apostate, by his rejection of Judaism and adoption of another religion, has effectively excommunicated himself. Practically speaking, this means that he loses all privileges of Judaism even while retaining all obligations.

This may be compared to one entitled to natural citizenship by virtue of being born in a country: when betraying his country, he may lose all privileges of his citizenship, yet remains subject to all laws and obligations.

Jewish law spells this out quite clearly: A meshumad (apostate) loses his status of being a member of the covenant (Sifra on Leviticus 1:2; Tossafot, Sanhedrin 72b).

The issue becomes more sensitive in context of a Jew accepting Christianity or the basic Christian doctrines. Judaism regards the Christian beliefs in the Trinity, Divine incarnation and that Jesus is a mediator between God and man, as idolatrous.

This is subject to the following qualification: Most authorities (especially of the Ashkenazi tradition) do not regard Christians who follow these doctrines of their faith to be idol-worshippers. Their ruling is based mainly on the fact that Christians do recognize and worship the One Supreme Being who created the universe.

In their view, non-Jews are allowed to add to this the acceptance of another being as a deity or mediator. This is known as the principle of shituf, associating another power with that of the Almighty.

For a Jew, however, any form of shituf is tantamount to idolatry in the fullest sense of the word. There is then no way that a Jew can ever accept Jesus as a deity, mediator or savior (messiah), or even as a prophet, without betraying Judaism. To call oneself, therefore, a "Hebrew-Christian," a "Jew for Jesus," or in the latest version a "Messianic Jew," is an oxymoron. Just as one cannot be a "Christian Buddhist," or a "Christian for Krishna," one cannot be a "Jew for Jesus."

'He loses all privileges of Judaism'

The fact that they presently use deceptive practices of wearing skullcaps, tzitzit and other symbols of traditional Judaism, or that they have services on the Jewish holy days with readings of the Torah, Kiddush and candlelighting etc., does not change one iota of their idolatrous status or excommunication.

Indeed, if and when any of them decide to return to the fold, Jewish law mandates that they must undergo a form of conversion to regain their Jewishness.

This new type of apostate often argues that Judaism is inconsistent in its judgment about them while continuing to regard non-believing and non-practising Jews as full Jews.

The Jewish position, however, is clearly defined by the rabbis: "Anyone who repudiates idolatry is called a Jew." Or in different terminology: "Repudiation of idolatry is tantamount to acknowledging the whole Torah, all the prophets and all that the prophets were commanded from the time of Adam to the end of time. Acceptance of idolatry is tantamount to repudiating the whole Torah, the prophets and everything that they were commanded from Adam to the end of time."

Maimonides thus rules: A Jew who worships idols (which includes the acceptance of Jesus), is like a gentile in every respect, and is not at all like a Jew who commits a capital offence. Moreover, whoever acknowledges the validity of idolatry, even if he does not worship it, reviles and blasphemes the honored and revered Name of God.

These principles are so intrinsic to Jewish identity that even the Israeli Supreme Court, in the famous case of "Brother Daniel [Rufeisen]," rejected the demand of an apostate to enjoy the privileges of Israel's Law of Return just because he continued to regard himself as Jewish.

Judaism, and Judaism alone, can define legitimate membership in its faith-community. It is the height of absurdity and chutzpah to reject Judaism and then redefine its original tradition. While the doors for tshuvah, for returning to the fold, remain forever open to anyone without exception, those who consciously betray their roots and identity have no place in the midst of their people, whether dead or alive

Telethons Seek Record Recruitment

UJA Federation is planning to recruit the largest contingent of telethon volunteers in its history. The telethon team, chaired by Rosanne Ain, Dov Altman, and Judy Engel will be recruiting hundreds of past and prospective volunteers for telethon events that raise millions of dollars on behalf of Jews in need.

Campaign 2000 telethons, which start September 13-16 and include Super Sunday on October 17, will be centred on a new Answer the Call contest. The name of every donor who picks up the phone by saying, "Hi, UJA. I'm answering the call," and then increases his or her gift, will be entered into a draw for attractive prizes. In addition, the volunteer who initiated the call will also be entered.

The telethon team leaders are planning specially designed volunteer programs, which, according to Altman, will "ensure that a real group closeness develops."

"We want to make sure that the volunteer experience is a positive one. The emphasis this year will not only be on fun, but on volunteer and donor appreciation."

Last year, over 500 people participated in campaign telethons and many of them cited a strong feeling of reward from the experience.

"It is the most direct way to get involved with the community," says Charles Newman, a former Montrealer who has been involved with UJA Federation since arriving two years ago. "What is more appropriate than having one Jew calling another to help? If I can say at the end of the day that I raised thousands of dollars, I can be proud that I have done my bit to help our community."

For Cheryl Jackson, it's a way to be a role model for her children. "The telethon was a great experience both for me and my daughter, Devra," she asserts. "It's wonderful to know that I'm passing on important values to my children. My daughter chose to come and we had a great day together."

Fay Gold, who's been volunteering since the Six-Day War, sees telethoning as her personal opportunity to help the Jewish community. Justine Fields, who came on board two years ago, says she is "proud to be part of something so worthy."

UJA Federation's Campaign 2000, which officially begins August 30, is striving for a fundraising objective of $50 million annually by 2001. The campaign proceeds will be used to assist the vulnerable, strengthen Jewish identity, and rescue Jews in danger.

To help meet the needs of the community into the next century, through UJA Federation telethons, contact Jared Isaacson at (416) 631-5732 to enroll as a telethon volunteer.

Ruth and Harold Margles have a driving desire to help people in need. Ruth has been volunteering for the kosher Meals on Wheels program, operated by Circle of Care, since 1982. Her husband joined the team in 1996. "It's very hands-on work which is extremely satisfying," says Ruth.

Each week, almost 400 meals are delivered across the Greater Toronto Area, but Ruth and Harold like to place a personal stamp on their own route. "We get to know the people, follow their health, living conditions, and then monitor any changes," says Ruth.

"We are often their primary contact with the outside world," adds Harold. "People need a lot more than just the meals."

Even though each visit is short, Harold and Ruth often stay to help with meal preparation and set-up. "Sometimes we help open the containers for them and have a chat about what's going on in the community," Ruth notes.

The rewards for the Margles are certainly evident by the number of years they've been involved with the program. "The satisfaction of being able to provide help to someone who needs it is indescribable," Ruth claims. "The majority of recipients are seniors who have become quite frail and can't always help themselves, so they're very vulnerable. Some are recovering from hospital stays and are recuperating at home."

The benefit for Harold is the direct contact. "I have always been involved with committees, but became frustrated with the bureaucracy. This gives me the opportunity to have one-to-one contact with people, helping to ease their loneliness and isolation."

For more information on the kosher Meals on Wheels program or to volunteer, call Shelly Rotman at the UJA Federation Volunteer Hotline (416) 635-2883 ext. 137.

Former lawyer fulfils dream of being rabbi

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The burning ambition of rabbinical student Nancy Morris is to serve a community in Europe that sorely needs a rabbi.

To this end, the 38-year-old Montreal-born woman is attending Leo Baeck College in London, England, where she is the only Canadian student. A former lawyer, Morris was recently awarded a $7,500 grant from the Memorial Foundation for Jewish Culture.

The New York foundation announced grants totalling more than $3.1 million to support Jewish scholars, educators and communal workers in 33 countries. Morris is the only Canadian winner.

Her goal is to serve the cause of progressive Judaism in Europe, an area of the world in need of rabbis; she is interested in working in France, where she has already made some contacts, or in another part of Europe, she said.

"The prejudice against female rabbis is still strong, especially in Europe," said Morris, "so it's a question of finding the right congregation." She is to be ordained at the end of her training in 2002.

Unlike students from England who must agree to take posts in that country upon ordination, Morris is free to go wherever she likes.

She has already been a rabbinic intern at Temple Emanu-El-Beth Sholom, in Montreal, and has served Jewish communities in Brataslavia and Vienna.

One of the experiences she remembers keenly was at a Slovak holiday camp where she added a Jewish flavor.

She is currently working with a chaplaincy unit in an inner-city London hospital.

She said that since her experience with a chaplain during her late father's illness, she has always been interested in pastoral counselling of hospital patients.

She said she was attracted to Leo Baeck College by the age range and diversity of the students, who come from all over the world.

Another student there, Grisha Abramovich – he intends to return to his native Beylorussia – also won a $7,500 grant from the Memorial foundation.

Morris' varied career has included work as an immigration officer at Amnesty International, legal work at both a large Toronto law firm and at a legal aid clinic in Montreal. She also served as a small communities liaison officer with Canadian Jewish Congress in Montreal.

Morris received two degrees from McGill University – her law degree in 1993 and her MA in Jewish Studies in 1990. She also studied at Hebrew University from 1984-85. She graduated from Concordia University in 1984 with a BA in western civilization and culture.

Nancy Morris

The daughter of the late Evelyn and David Morris, Morris has three brothers in Toronto – Noah, Michael and Josh.

Breast cancer, heredity linked

The study concludes that "testing should be offered to all Jewish women with breast cancer diagnosed before the age of 50 years, or have first or second degree relatives with ovarian or early-onset breast cancer."

Those who are found to have the genetic mutations can take precautions, Warner said, such as frequent breast self-examinations and mammograms, or even prophylactic breast or ovary removal.

The mutations can be found on either the maternal or paternal sides of the family, so it is important to consider the entire family history, Warner said.

Male relatives should also be tested, as the genetic mutation appears to raise the incidence of prostate cancer.

Warner struck a note of caution against relying totally on the genetic testing. "The penetrance (the number of people with the mutations that actually develop breast, ovarian or prostate cancer) ranges from only 30 to 90 percent" she said.

Also, she added, researchers don't know exactly what a negative result means in terms of susceptibility to cancer.

Another point, is that it appears that the BRCA2 gene mutation doesn't cause as much damage in younger women as BRCA1 does.

"That may mean that women with BRCA2 mutation may catch up in later years. The literature suggests that that is what is happening."

There are families that have the mutation and nobody gets these cancers, Warner said. Similarly, there are families where everyone is affected.

The study was conducted by doctors Warner, Steven Narod of Women's College Hospital; William Foulkes, Jewish General Hospital of Montreal; Pamela Goodwin of Mount Sinai Hospital; Wendy Meschino, North York General Hospital; and Paul Goss, Toronto Hospital, Princess Margaret Division.

Funds came from, among other sources, the U.S National Institute of Health, through the Ontario Cancer Genetics Network, the Canadian Breast Cancer Foundation, and Cancer Research Society.

Research was conducted at Sunnybrook, Mount Sinai, Women's College, Toronto, and North York General hospitals, and Sir Mortimer B. Davis Jewish General Hospital in Montreal.

Although the results have been published, research is ongoing, Warner said.

People who are concerned, can go to a familial cancer clinic (such as the one at Sunnybrook Regional Cancer Centre) either directly, or through their family doctor or gynecologist, said Warner.

Books changed life of CHAT scholarship winner

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Vivian Koval finds it hard to imagine what people do with their time if they don't read.

The 19-year-old graduate of the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT), who recently returned from 10 months of study in Israel, was awarded last year's Dennis Waldman scholarship, based in large part on an impassioned essay she wrote, describing the impact books have had on her life.

The Waldman scholarship is given annually to a graduating high school student, either a public school student intending to pursue Jewish studies at university or a student from a Jewish school intending to pursue university-level work.

Books have "increased my vocabulary, allowed me to live vicariously, introduced me to strange, new worlds, and deeply affected the way I regard the world around me," Koval wrote.

Personal accounts of the Holocaust, which she "devoured" in elementary school, imbued her with gratitude and a sense of responsibility.

She was also affected by books on health and medicine, which she said evoked her determination to make a contribution.

A longtime volunteer, Koval has worked in a hands-on capacity with developmentally disabled adults at the Reena Foundation, and with young patients at Bloorview Hospital and the Hospital for Sick Children.

She also served as vice-president of Yachad, the division of National Conference of Synagogue Youth (NCSY) that integrates developmentally disabled youth with their non-disabled counterparts.

Last summer, Koval worked at a camp for children with severe neurological disorders, the most challenging, stressful task she's ever undertaken. "But the actual work, I was really good at," she said. "I bonded with my kids."

The experience made her realize she'd like to work with disabled children as a career.

While in Israel, where she studied at the women's yeshiva

Vivian Koval

Midreshet Lindenbaum (and for which she also received an NCSY scholarship), Koval volunteered through NCSY, tutoring a Russian-Israeli girl in English.

The Hebrew language and text study skills she acquired at CHAT and Associated Hebrew Schools – from which she graduated as a valedictorian – enabled her to deal with the more extensive work at Midreshet Lindenbaum, she said.

Although she spent long hours in the classroom, learning for the sake of learning, Koval feels she got a real taste of what it's like to live in Israel – dealing with bureaucracy at the bank and post office, shopping at the shuk and preparing her own meals.

"It was a really well-rounded experience, and I grew immeasurably from it, both religiously and as a person," said Koval. "I'd never been to Israel before. It was an amazing way to see it for the first time."

Koval deferred her acceptance and full entrance scholarship to York University, where she will be studying psychology and linguistics this year.

"I was getting more involved in religious observance," she said. "Going to Israel was another step in cementing myself in the kind of lifestyle I want to lead."

JVS program could fold

By BLAIR SANDERSON
Special to The CJN

When you're just beginning to break into your career of choice, you often find yourself searching for a clue as to what will give you an added advantage in impressing potential employers.

Having a mentor is one of the best ways to gain insight into what might give you the edge over the competition.

For young Jews, the Jewish Vocational Service (JVS) of Greater Toronto is offering a program called Career Connections, which brings together students and recent graduates with mentors in their fields of interest.

However, Career Connections is in jeopardy of closing in September due to a lack of funding.

Zac Kaye of Jewish Campus Services, who was involved initially in the program, said it would be a shame if it was discontinued.

"For young people, the economy hasn't changed dramatically," he said. "Accomplishing goals through the resources we have to offer is very useful to them."

Having graduated from Humber College's journalism program two years ago, this reporter has been struggling to find full-time employment while gaining experience from freelance assignments for community newspapers and magazines.

However, since working with Marsha Lederman, host of two daily shows on Toronto radio station Talk 640, this reporter has revamped his resume to reflect accomplishments with various magazines, and feature a portfolio which highlights the most impressive pieces.

From Lederman's perspective, the program is a chance to help out someone who is going through the growing pains she's already experienced.

"Anyone who's had a degree of success should be giving back to the community," Lederman said.

Joel Lupus is in the early stages of the mentor process with David Beron, marketing manager at Nortel. He already has a summer job in between the second and third years of his engineering program at the University of Toronto.

Lupus' mentor is helping him to make the most of his experience working for Ontario Power Generation (previously Ontario Hydro).

"[Beron] said that students are often put into a specific area instead of managing a project," said Lupus, pointing out the importance of getting as diverse an experience as possible through summer jobs or internships.

Beron has had previous experience mentoring in similar programs such as the UJA Federation's leadership development program, as well as at work.

"It has helped me know what questions to ask up front, getting the process moving," said Beron.

While Lupus wants to know how a project is managed, Beron believes that making sure he has the necessary skills for work in the field is an area that is also important.

Kaye said Career Connections was inspired by Hillel programs at American universities, and that looking into sources of funding for those programs might lead to sources for the program here.

Kim Coulter of the JVS, who was also involved in initiating the program, suggested that one idea might be to dovetail the existing program into other youth-oriented programs.

These photos convey merely a handful of the celebratory scenes from this year's Yom Canada gathering of Canadian teenagers travelling through Israel this summer on Canada Israel Experience programs, which was held on July 12 at the Amnon Holiday Village on the northeastern shore of the Kinneret. Clockwise from lower left, having fun on a banana boat; Charles and Andrea Bronfman meet with some of the youngsters; dressing up in traditional Moroccan garb; a singsong with some of the local Israelis; two girls having their hair plaited by newly found friends of Ethiopian background.

Shul marks 25th

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Congregation Machzikei Hadas recently celebrated its silver anniversary in its present location with a gala at the synagogue.

Congregants mingled and reminisced about the old shul on Murray Street and the challenges involved when they moved to their "new" suburban location.

Congratulatory telegrams were read from Prime Minister Jean Chrétien and Governor General Romeo Leblanc.

Deputy Prime Minister Herb Gray, on his way to South Africa to represent the prime minister at the swearing in of the new president, came to offer his best wishes in person.

His greetings, he said, were brought "as deputy prime minister, but especially as a member of this congregation which has a special atmosphere of warmth and family togetherness."

Ontario Liberal leader Dalton McGuinty, who lives near the synagogue, said he considers himself a neighbor of the congregation.

He told this story: "On June 4, [the day after he lost his election bid to become premier of Ontario], I was pictured in the Globe & Mail with Rabbi Bulka. Millions of Ontarians were asking themselves: 'Who was that guy with Rabbi Bulka?'"

In response, Rabbi Bulka commented that "this was [McGuinty's] first speech of the next campaign."

Former governor general, Ray Hnatyshyn, who was involved in the presentation to the synagogue of its first coat of arms, said, "I have just [marked] my agenda for 25 years from now when you celebrate your 50th."

Also present to convey their good wishes were Mayor Jim Watson and Deputy Mayor Allan Higdon.

Lorry Greenberg dies at 65

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — The flags at City Hall flew at half-mast on Canada Day in memory of former mayor Lorry Greenberg, who died the day before of heart failure at the age of 65.

Obituary

More than 800 people at the funeral, held at Congregation Agudath Israel, remembered the former mayor with love and affection.

One of four brothers who founded Minto Construction, the largest home builder in the region, Greenberg sold his interest in the company to devote himself to a career in social work, helping to establish the city's Youth Services Bureau.

In the late 1960s he became a city councillor, and in 1974 became the first Jewish mayor of Ottawa.

Greenberg had his first heart attack in 1977, and he left politics the following year to spend more time with his family.

His son Jeff, said at the funeral that his father "came from very humble beginnings and accomplished so much. Is it not remarkable that he was wined and dined at 24 Sussex by former prime minister Pierre Trudeau, who wanted him to run federally, and then sometime later be courted by the Progressive Conservatives?

"They knew, as we did, that he was an honest man of vision and compassion. Quite simply, he cared for people."

Rabbi Arnold Fine said that Greenberg never wore ties, except the one important "tie" – tfillin. Rabbi Fine spoke about Greenberg's devotion to Judaism, noting that no business of any kind was ever conducted on Friday night, a time that remained sacred for his family.

Jeff Greenberg said, "The head of our family table may sit empty, but in our minds and hearts, he will forever be there. His zest for life, his stories, his lessons, his love...will live on."

Lorry Greenberg is survived by his wife Carol, sons Jeff and Roger, daughters Rhonda, Stephanie and Heather, and five grandchildren.

Canadians recall transport

By MOURA WOLPERT
CJN Correspondent

LONDON — More than 1,300 "kinder" gathered here recently to mark the 60th anniversary of the arrival of the Kindertransporte, which had transported about 10,000 children to safety from Nazi Germany.

Those who had remained in England after the war, met with groups from the United States, Israel, Australia and a small contingent from Canada to take part in the three-day reunion, held at the Palace of Westminster.

In the convention hall, where guests ate lunch, each table bore a sign with the name of a German or Austrian city such as Berlin, Duesseldorf, Frankfurt or Vienna, as well as a table for Poland and another for Czechoslovakia.

The "kinder" scanned the tables, searching for long lost friends, and announcements were made: "[Someone] is looking for...from... "If you are here, will you please come forward."

To many, this is what the reunion is all about – finding someone who remembers you when you were a child. Some of the kinder had come to England with a sibling or to join family there, but to many, the other kinder were their only family.

For Vera Kittel of Downsview, who attended the reunion with her husband Fred and daughter Margaret Kittel-Canale, the highlight of the reunion was finding a girlfriend with whom she had stayed in a hostel in Cambridge, and had not seen in 60 years.

Growing up "in a foreign environment, I felt like an outsider," she said. "Today, we all lead very different lives, but we all share the same background."

Lore Jacobs of Hamilton, agreed. "I always considered myself odd, but reading about and hearing what other kids went through, I realized I was not the only one, that others had the same experiences."

For Jacobs, the reunion was "very emotional, very tactful, very touching. We are all like one big family."

Jacobs was accompanied by her son Peter, a physicist at University of California at Berkeley.

Kittel said that it was not until the first reunion in London, in 1989, that many parents began to talk to their children about their experiences. Jacobs, however, says that she and her late husband Erwin, also a teenage refugee, always spoke to their two children about their background.

"None of us talked to our children," said Inge Dux-Hermann, also of Toronto, who had trained as a nurse in England before settling in Canada, as did fellow Torontonian Anne Porter, whose parents survived by hiding in Holland.

Kittel-Canale said it is "important that kids know about their parents' background," and attending the reunion with them is "a very positive experience."

Carol Anne Borgh, whose late mother was also a "kind," came with her father, Gunther Cahn of Toronto. She always wanted to know more about her roots, she said, and has attended several reunions. "I have always been very moved."

In a small group, assembled by Lisa Collier, co-chair of the Toronto gathering, Max Kingston said that he is concerned that Jews don't realize the importance of educating their children about the Holocaust.

Ernest Hurst, who has returned to his native Vienna several times, said that while there, he spoke about what happened in Austria, to teens working on a history project. "They were stunned to meet an actual survivor."

Paul Heimann, originally from Vienna, and his wife Trudi from Czechoslovakia, were both kinder, but met in Toronto.

At the reunion, a bronze plaque was unveiled by the Speaker of the House of Commons, Betty Boothroyd.

"In gratitude to the People and Parliament of the United Kingdom for saving the lives of 10,000 Jewish children and others who fled to this country from Nazi persecution on the Kindertransporte 1938-39," it read.

Activities during the three days included a service led by Chief Rabbi Jonathan Sacks, workshops and lectures on topics including writing one's memoirs, teaching the Holocaust from personal experience, and searching for lost families on the Internet. The group also toured the Houses of Parliament and the Imperial War Museum.

The Rock's Jews are hardy, but feel forgotten

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

ST. JOHN'S — It's tough being Jewish on The Rock.

On the other hand, Newfoundland's tiny Jewish community wouldn't have it any other way.

While communal leaders here grouse that Canada's national Jewish organizations have ignored or forgotten them, they add only a breath later that life here is good: the blue sky, the salt air, the lack of traffic and bustle, virtually no anti-Semitism. As community member David Mercer put it, in that distinctive Newfoundland brogue, "It's both easy and difficult to be Jewish here. We are survivors."

In Newfoundland generally, a sense of isolation from the mainland is considered both good and bad. Good because the province, (always referred to by locals as Newfoundland and Labrador) can pursue its unique lifestyle, rich culture and heritage, and generally feel distinct. Privately, many here roll their eyes when the subject of Quebec's demands for distinct society status come up. "You can't get more distinct than here," one community member said emphatically.

And bad because there's still a lingering resentment in Newfoundland over joining Confederation 50 years ago: that as a member of what the United Nations says is the best country to live in the world, Newfoundland is still a have-not province, a place the rest of Canada doesn't seem to care about.

Those feelings seem to spill over into the Jewish community. "We feel ignored by the major Jewish institutions," says Michael Paul, a 45-year-old doctor and president of the Hebrew Congregation of Newfoundland and Labrador, referred to as Beth El Synagogue, now the only shul in St. John's, and the province. There are sporadic visits by community leaders – Canadian Jewish Congress president Moshe Ronen's wife is from St. John's, and Ronen was here for a speaking engagement more than a year ago – and Israel's Montreal-based consul general also comes, but not often.

Jews here are represented on the Atlantic Jewish Council, which provides support for Maritime and Newfoundland Jewry. Messod Salama, a former Torontonian who teaches Spanish at Memorial University, is the Atlantic region representative on the national executive of Canadian Jewish Congress.

The last federal census had much to say. It tallied 422 Jews in Newfoundland, but the synagogue has only 25 families as members. That means there are many unaffiliated Jews here, and those whose transience does not compel them to join the shul. Community lore brims with stories of Jewish sailors and other servicemen from several countries who pass through, en route to more exotic locales.

Numbers are boosted thanks to Memorial University, which supplies several Jewish students and staff for services and activities. Mainlanders are brought here mainly by jobs; that was the case with Paul, who attended McGill and the University of Toronto, and came here 16 years ago. He now maintains a private practice and teaches at Memorial.

Dr. Michael Paul, president of Beth El Synagogue, stands on the bimah.

The Elizabeth Street synagogue was built in 1959, at a time when membership probably hit its highest level – around 100 families. Since then, there's been a steady decline, as young people left for greener pastures, mainly Montreal, Toronto and Ottawa. As older members of the community retired, they too left to be near their children and grandchildren.

In the 1960s, the small synagogues in Stephenville and Corner Brook closed, the Torah scrolls and artifacts from the latter shipped to an Ethiopian congregation in Israel. Since then, the community has continued to shrink. The last rabbi left in 1985, and the synagogue's mikvah is unused.

But there were no long faces when The CJN reporter met recently with about a dozen members of the community over tea and cookies. Services are held every Friday night (Jewish tourists are invited to lead them), festivals are celebrated, there are 10 kids in an after-school Hebrew program (there's a search on for a new Hebrew teacher) and as the community's eight-page, photocopied history states, "the fundamentals of Jewish observance and culture [are] cherished."

The community's biggest event takes place every Yom Hashoah. Last April, over 350 people, including several Christian clergy members and local political figures, attended the Holocaust memorial service.

Funds are raised for United Israel Appeal, and the Jewish National Fund maintains the Newfoundland Grove in Israel.

The synagogue was founded on Orthodox principles, but is Conservative in practice. Women are counted as members of the minyan. Kosher meat and foodstuffs are brought in once or twice a year for those who request them, and during Passover, a local grocery arranges the import of kosher products.

No bustle, sea air . make life special

A deal has been struck with the Salvation Army to help maintain the Jewish cemetery on Blackmarsh Road. Graves there hold the remains of several American servicemen and other Jewish sojourners.

Synagogue members, especially Robin McGrath, an award-winning writer and chronicler of Newfoundland Jewry, love to tell the story of how three Polish sailors whose vessel was docked in St. John's had rescued a Torah from Czestochowa, and brought it with them to sell to the community.

And then there was a very famous Jew, Leon Trotsky, who lived briefly in St. John's while en route to Mexico City, where he met an untimely death at the end of an ice pick, courtesy of one of Stalin's hit men.

Synagogue regular June Mercer recalls the days when Russians would jump plane in Gander. In time, Russian Jews outnumbered the community, but they have since moved on.

According to McGrath's well-researched history of the Jews of Newfoundland and Labrador, little is known about early Jewish settlement of the province. Some sources say the first Jews on the island were Simon Solomon, a jeweller and watchmaker who settled in St. John's around 1792, and Israel Palmer, who settled in the George's Brook area in the early 1800s. Solomon became an innkeeper and was appointed Newfoundland's first postmaster, succeeded by his son, William.

The synagogue was founded in 1909 by Israel Perlin, who came to Newfoundland from Russia, via New York, to escape induction into the army. Soon, Perlin was training Jewish emigres from Poland and Russia as itinerant peddlers, supplying them with clothing and other goods to sell to communities along the bay.

Perlin later turned his Henry Street premises over to the community to become the first synagogue. Among the early congregants can be found names like Sidel, Levitz, Rosenburg, Cohen and Granum.

Throughout the '30s and '40s, Jews continued to expand to places like Bell Island, Grand Falls and Corner Brook. During World War II, the community busied itself with providing Jewish religious and social programs for the many American servicemen stationed in the province.

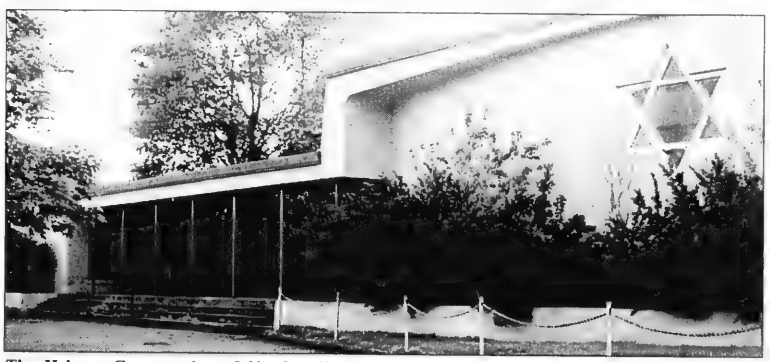
After the war, a new wave of refugees from Europe revitalized the community. Some were Holocaust survivors; there are still several survivors in St. John's, including Rabbi Justin Fromm, who had been the community's spiritual leader in the '50s and '60s but whose advanced years have put him out of commission.

What makes life here so special?

"There's no traffic," offers Claire Salama, who moved here from Toronto with her husband Messod in 1985. "Housing is inexpensive, at least compared to Toronto. This morning, the sky was blue and you could taste the sea air." Salama, a French and Spanish teacher and mother of two, concedes she was apprehensive about moving here from the big city, but as she's discovered, "quality of life does matter."

Sid Epstein, 68, proudly presents himself as the oldest member of the community who was born in Newfoundland. "There's virtually no anti-Semitism here," he says. He remembers being cheerfully exempted from Christian instruction in public school. "It was a great place to grow up."

Indeed, congregants say relations with the general community, churches and politicians, have been more than cordial.



The Hebrew Congregation of Newfoundland and Labrador, known as Beth El Synagogue, on Elizabeth Street, was built in 1959.

Anti-Semitic acts were, and are rare. Once, the synagogue was daubed with a swastika (it coincided with vandalism against a Catholic school). A menorah was once stolen from the shul; its thief later confessed he took it because he was mad at Jews. Why? His friend had been run over by a car in front of the synagogue.

Like all Newfoundlanders, Jews here are a resilient bunch, with a sense of humor and a thick skin. Says community leader Paul: "Our obituary was written many years ago. But we're still here."

"איך זה שכל כך הרבה יהודים שאי מכיר מצליחים במקצועותיהם, ואיך זה שהם כל כך בעלי אמביציה, ואיך זה שאתם הישראלים אפילו יותר מהיהודים עם חוצפה להצליח ולדבוק במשימה?" כך שאל אותי לא מזמן חבר לא יהודי. חשבתי וחשבתי וחשבתי והינה המסקנה החד משמעית: הכל מתחיל ונגמר במקומו של הילד במשפחה. במשפחה יהודית הילד במרכז העניינים. לפיו ישק דבר. אמא ואבא יילכו יחפים ובלבד שהוא ילמד במקום הכי טוב. כל מילה שהוא אומר - זו הברקה מאלוהים. ילד ישראלי טיפוסי - משפחתו קונה לו דירה לנישואיו. ראיתם כבר ילד קנדי מהמעמד הבינוני שקונים לו דירה? בביקורי בארץ הדבר הכי בולט הוא איך מתנהגים לילדים כמו למלכים: מוצי פוצי, פוצי מוצי, נשיקה מכל דודה או סבנית דודה וכל מכר או חבר טורח שעות לספר לך איך הבן שלו מצטיין בתיכון ואיך הבת שלו השיגה מקום ראשון בכיתה בפיזיקה. כשאדם מתחיל את חייו עם כל כך הרבה חום ותמיכה, הוא מגדל אגו בריא. הוא מפתח ביטחון עצמי, הוא יודע שהוא שווה. אם לא נותנים לו את כל אלה כשהוא קטן - לא יהיה לו את זה אפילו אם יהיה חכם איינשטיין. וכך קורה שגם אנשים מאוד בינוניים מצליחים. לאורך החיים אפשר לראות לא אחת ולא שתיים אנשים מבריקים שיש להם ביטחון עצמי של עלה נידף, ואין הם מגיעים לשום מקום. לעומתם - לישראלי הממוצע יש ביטחון עצמי של שחקן NBA. הוא יודע שהוא יצליח. הוא בטוח שהוא יצליח. הידיעה והביטחון האלה הם שלושת רבעי ההצלחה. אז זהו - מאחורי הצלחה הישראלית עומדים ההורים, ובעיקר האמא היהודית שלנו. אבל שישאר בינינו.

Agreement in W'peg

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — After two years of negotiations, Winnipeg's synagogues and the Winnipeg Jewish Community Council's (WJCC) Multiple Appeals Commission (MAC) have agreed on a new set of guidelines.

The WJCC established MAC 13 years ago to regulated fundraising activities in the community. Under MAC guidelines, all fundraising events that were expected to raise more than $10,000 had to be cleared with the commission, and there were restrictions on how often organizations could hold major fundraisers.

As well, a six-week span, from the beginning of September to the middle of October, was set aside for the annual Combined Jewish Appeal campaign. During that period, no other fundraising activities are supposed to take place in the community.

The issue with the synagogues came to a head two years ago, when one major synagogue's annual High Holy Days campaign raised money in excess of the guidelines. In response, MAC chair Dr. Michael Helper, ran a large ad in the local Jewish Post and News criticizing several synagogues for violating the guidelines. The synagogues, which have never received any funding from the CJA campaign, reacted with anger, and vowed to unite and fight to change the guidelines.

Through the mediation of WJCC president Larry Hurtig, a new set of rules have been agreed upon. The latest guidelines, which were released on May 13, allow the synagogues to hold a major fundraising event annually without restrictions, and allow the synagogues to continue to have High Holy Day appeals even though the holidays fall within the CJA moratorium period.

The guidelines also raise the maximum dollar figure for a minor fundraising campaign from $10,000 to $25,000.

"Our board has approved the new guidelines," says Steven Feldgaier, immediate past president of the Rosh Pina Congregation and the chair of the synagogue presidents committee that negotiated the changes. He says that "it was a long drawn-out process, but that the end results were well worth it."

Bronfman fellowships

ALBANY — Two Grade 11 students from Ontario are among 26 teenagers named to receive 1999 Bronfman Youth Fellowships under a program designed to develop future community leaders committed to the concept of Jewish unity.

They are Rebecca Hart of Toronto and Aaron Orkin of Hamilton.

This summer, the two will spend five weeks in Israel with the Youth Fellowship program, launched 13 years ago by Edgar Bronfman, chair of the Seagram Company Ltd. and president of the World Jewish Congress.

The 26 fellows, chosen from over 320 applicants, were selected on the basis of character, intellectual interests, special talents and leadership qualities. Merit, not financial need, is the standard of selection for this fully funded award.

Hart, daughter of Marilynne Glick and Douglas Hart, is a student at North Toronto Collegiate Institute where she has been a honor student every year, and was the recipient of the MacGillivray Memorial Award in English in Grade 9. She has been a writer and senior editor for the high school newspaper, and has been a member of the poetry club, Students for Environmental Awareness, the girl's swim team and the camera club.

Orkin, son of Dr. Cheryl Levitt and Andrew Orkin, attends Westdale Secondary School in Hamilton. A keen debater and public speaker for which he has won a number of awards, Aaron is actively involved with Students for Political Action and the history club at Westdale, most recently serving as co-chair of the Westdale High School Holocaust Education Week. He also participated in the McMaster environmental water monitoring program.

He is a participant in the Hamilton Midrash High School program where he studies Jewish philosophy and history, and attends a discussion class concerning issues in modern Jewish life.

The group flew to Israel on June 29, following an orientation seminar in New York City, and will return to the United States on August 4. They will spend their five weeks in Israel in a program of intensive study, travel and dialogue with members of the educational staff of the Bronfman Fellowship program, as well as with political and literary figures, representing a broad spectrum of views on key political, social and religious issues facing world Jewry.

This summer, for the second year running, the Samuel Bronfman Foundation has created a parallel group of young Israeli high school students, called Amitei Bronfman. This was conceived in co-operation with Mifgashim, a program of Charles Bronfman's CRB Foundation.

Scene in Ottawa

By G.K. SIMCOE

We pause in our examination of summertime caucus activity to reflect on the most recent string of tragedies that has befallen the Kennedy family. Our collective reaction to that event – and media reaction in particular – raises an issue that has confounded political figures for some time. Let's set the stage.

One of the political developments that drew much media attention over the last few months concerns the ever vulnerable Canadian magazine industry and Sheila Copps's legislative efforts to protect its advertising revenue in the face of overwhelming competition from the American magazine industry.

The controversial legislation Copps tabled generated concern, anger and derision, even among many of the minister's own colleagues, such as cabinet colleague, Sergio Marchi and fellow Steel City MP, Stan Keyes, both of whom worried about the possibility of American trade "retaliation."

Still others poked fun at Copps' "hollow" efforts to fend-off the domineering Yankees, arguing (correctly, it turned out!) that the bill would be diluted before it ever came to a vote.

The absence of a "Canada First" wellspring of support – beyond the hallways of Saturday Night, Canadian Geographic and Maclean's – did not go unnoticed by that staunch federalist and widely respected Liberal Senator Jerry Grafstein.

This brings us back to the media coverage of the Kennedy story. While it is (vaguely) understandable that American television networks and press would super-saturate the public with the story, the disproportionate attention paid to the tragedy by Canadian media is incomprehensible.

Have Canadians become, as so many social and political pundits claim, so completely assimilated into American culture that their national loss becomes our own?

The good Senator Grafstein worries about such things. He worries about the nature of our bilateral relationship with the United States and Canada's long-term ability to effectively assert its distinct character.

As the lynchpin behind the Canada-U.S. Parliamentary Association, he is determined to make Canada's unique presence more tangibly and effectively felt in Washington. The good senator understands that what's at stake is not just magazines like Canadian Living, but rather, how we will live Canadian.

In announcing the festival lineup, Artistic Director David Buchbinder remarked, "three is the number of balance, strength and dynamism and we look to the third ASHKENAZ to embody these qualities. Combining the lessons of the first two festivals with attention to the unfolding spirit of this ☛

Come join the parade! A wonderfully exuberant street spectacle of sound and colour, this is the festival's largest work of art! An ecstatic two hour journey from Kensington Market, the heart of old Jewish Toronto, to Harbourfront Centre. Giant puppets, wild costumes, banners, placards and flags, and a mass Yiddish/Brazilian band!

(continued) particular incarnation, allows us to confidently predict that ASHKENAZ '99 will take festivalgoers — whatever their background — on a roller coaster ride of cultural celebration they won't soon forget."

We asked David Buchbinder a few questions about this year's festival.

Why is this Ashkenaz Festival different from all other Ashkenaz Festivals?

Well, first of all let me say that the main difference is that this is this ASHKENAZ and not the one from two years ago, or four years ago. Almost every artist is new, the people are different, the programming is unique to this year. However, each new Ashkenaz Festival builds on the ones that went before. Themes and ideas that we weren't able to realize before are being realized now, or are coming ever closer to being realized.

How has the programming as a whole evolved?

There have been some very definite changes and developments in programming. While the music and theatre/dance components, which have always been the strongest aspects of the festival, continue to be as strong or stronger than before, the other areas have begun to catch up. For example, the literary component will offer two special readings, three five-and-ten minute cabarets and several lectures on literary themes. One of these literary highlights will be Re-Imagining the Shtetl, a reading featuring a real find from our own backyard, the Yiddish/English writer from Montreal, Yehuda Elberg, whose The Empire of Kalman the Cripple is one of the best works I have ever read. Also featured will be Lilian Nattel who has been winning awards and critical acclaim with her first novel The River Midnight; and the pioneering Holocaust scholar, Yaffa Eliach.

In the area of visual arts, we are now using every single bit of space that Harbourfront Centre offers for our six special exhibits; and for the first time, we are going to have a chance for real site transformation. We have commissioned some of Toronto's finest painters, graphic designers and theatre artists to transform Harbourfront Centre for the festival, giving a visual context for the programming. People will have the feeling that when they walk through the various arched portals and see the wonderful stage surrounds, that they have entered a special space, a magical place, where they can enjoy, watch and participate in a cultural experience that is challenging, passionate and fun.

You mentioned themes that are now being realized. What do you mean?

As the festival becomes more "established," we are able to realize one of my personal dreams. We are not only drawing upon the resources of artists we have found, or who have come to us with proposals, but we are actually catalysing the creation of new work.

Firstly, there is the musical centrepiece of the festival which is the Ashkenaz Orchestra Project. For the first time in history, twenty top musicians from a whole variety of different backgrounds are coming together to perform new Jewish music by seven different composers. This is just a first step in a project that I hope will have a life of its own after the festival is over, touring and performing in this country and all over the globe.

Another example of commissioned work is Dave Douglas and Charms of the Night Sky. We are now at a stage where we can approach some of the best artists in the world to create something from the raw material of Yiddish culture. Dave Douglas, whom I first heard when he was playing with John Zorn and now consider to be one of the best improvising trumpeters/composers around, has a talent for creating a seamless, but unusual blend of music. He incorporates different sounds and improvisations into his compositions, drawing on his knowledge of Jewish/European music but without sacrificing his own unique expression. Since he is not Jewish, he is a perfect example of what I always say about the festival: that it's about creativity and not about ethnicity.

So the festival is acting as a catalyst both for projects like this, as well as creating much more grass-roots community-based works as well, like the Parade.

How has the Ashkenaz Parade developed this year?

As in past years, the Parade will be a colourful, grooving and hopefully ecstatic experience as it moves from Kensington Market down to Harbourfront Centre. There will also be a big jump this year in terms of size and the number of participants, as well as in the development of the idea. Once again, the Parade (as well as the visual transformation of the Harbourfront site) is under the direction of Anne Barber of the award-winning Shadowland Theatre. This year, we are fortunate to have the additional presence of Anne's mentor, Peter Kiddle, from England. Peter is an original member of Welfare State, the innovative British theatre company, and he has created participatory theatre projects and street theatre around the world.

On to a related topic, but not necessarily about ASHKENAZ. How can you describe the status of current Yiddish culture?

Yiddish and new Jewish culture has literally exploded in the last six years. From the seeds of a few klezmer bands there are now hundreds of bands, and while some are derivative certainly, there are many that are writing exciting new Jewish music. Currently there is a real Renaissance in Jewish culture. It is as if the life force of the Jewish people is reasserting itself fifty years after it was almost eliminated. This is the result, possibly, of the unprecedented freedom that Jews in North America have experienced. As well, it is not totally unrelated to or happening in isolation from religion. As always in Jewish history, religion and culture are tied, even if the cultural expression is not a particularly religious one.

And finally, on a personal note. This is a tremendous amount of work. How do you manage to keep your enthusiasm going?

By doing other things — composing, and playing music — the essentials. With ASHKENAZ, focusing on the fact that it is a process. Each time we create the festival, it is the first time, and we are always developing something new. Most importantly, I am working with a great group of people, and we are actually creating the festival before it happens. That always keeps it interesting. ●

"Currently there is a real Renaissance in Jewish culture. It is as if the life force of the Jewish people is reasserting itself fifty years after it was almost eliminated." David Buchbinder, Artistic Director

RE-IMAGINING THE SHTETL

Wed Sept 1, 7pm — Premiere Dance Theatre — $8

The shtetl was the heart of Jewish communal and family life in Europe before the Nazi Holocaust completely destroyed this culture. Survivors of the Holocaust and their children have set themselves to reweaving the broken threads of ancestral history and the lifeblood of a people. Come hear master Yiddishist Yehuda Elberg, author of numerous works, most recently The Empire of Kalman the Cripple; new literary sensation Lilian Nattel, whose first novel The River Midnight has received widespread acclaim; and Yaffa Eliach, a pioneering scholar in Holocaust studies and author of There Once Was a World and Hasidic Tales of the Holocaust read from and discuss their work.

WE'RE COUNTING ON YOU!
The Ashkenaz Foundation is a non-profit organization created to preserve and perpetuate the dazzling creativity and culture of a Yiddish speaking Eastern European world – a world revered for its demise, but hitherto unacknowledged for the vitality of its people, their commitment to Judaism, family, humanity and social justice. The joys and tribulations of their lives were expressed and chronicled through the eloquent genius of Yiddish literature, theatre, poetry, nigunim, music, art and song.

It takes effort and money to build on the past and secure a vibrant Jewish future. ASHKENAZ '99 is most fortunate to have General Motors of Canada Limited and Four Seasons Hotels and Resorts as major festival sponsors. General Motors of Canada Limited has donated a 1999 Cadillac Seville STS for the festival to raffle off. Tickets, at $10 each or in books of six for $50, will be sold throughout the summer at various locations around town as well as at the festival. The odds of winning are quite high for this double mitzvah donation. Whether you buy raffle tickets, join our list of donors, or do both, know that young people of today and children of tomorrow are counting on you to maintain our Yiddish legacy.

The convention in Vancouver is expected to attract a record attendance, said Bloom. "We are very excited about taking our convention to Vancouver. This event should be a momentous occasion for Na'amat Canada.

"We hope to make it a very special dynamic, inspiring experience as we head into the new millennium".

The theme of the 12th triennial convention is Na'amat meets the 21st century. The convention will take place Oct. 9 to 11.

The national convention chair is Na'amat Calgary's Stephanie Sacks, the programming chair is Cheryl Milner and local planning is being coordinated by Vancouver's Tamara Levi-Bandel.

The convention will include a program exploring the Holocaust through art therapy, sessions on family law, and a luncheon discussion about the future of Na'amat in Canada and Israel.

The convention will feature Abby Leibman and Sandra Polinsky who will speak on domestic abuse and family law, and Dana Wachtel who will speak on the status of women in Israel.

The convention will also include a tour of Vancouver and a stop at the anthropology museum at the University of British Columbia.

Fez, Morocco – 2,000 Years of Jewish History

By ESTELLE MELZER
Special to The CJN

Yehuda Azuelos sits at his dining room table surrounded by Moroccan family treasures and tries to convey in words the magic of his last trip back to his birthplace, Fez.

"For me, for my family who accompanied me, it was a once in a lifetime experience," he explained. "We were not just going back in place, we were going back in time.

"I felt as if I had somehow become a part of the history of my family and our entire community in Fez – a history that goes back over 2,000 years to the destruction of the Second Temple."

Azuelos had visited Morocco many times since he emigrated in 1968. But this trip was unique.

He had timed it to coincide with the official dedication ceremony for the Ibn Danan Synagogue in Fez, a 17th-century synagogue which had been designated as a world historic site by the World Monuments Watch – making it one of 500 monuments and sites worldwide to be protected and saved.

He was also returning to Fez to research his own family's history there. "My father, who now lives in Toronto, turned 100 this year," Azuelos said. "I know this because two years ago I visited our family's graves in Fez, and saw on my grandfather's tombstone that he had died in 1901. My father knew that he was 2 years old when his father passed away."

Sitting in the Jewish cemetery of Fez, surrounded by 500 years of his ancestors, Azuelos was struck with the desire to find out and record more of his family's rich history.

He recruited his brother and sisters for the project and was accompanied on the trip by representatives of his entire immediate family – his son, Alan Azuelos, sister Simone Benrimof from New York, sister Renee Mouyal from Toronto, niece Esther Laderman from Toronto (the daughter of his late sister Denise), and brother Abner Azuelos and his wife Leah from Israel. Abner had left Fez as a child of 10, and was making his first trip back to his birthplace.

"There were two things we wanted to do – visit the graves of our family, and visit the old houses we remembered, especially the house we grew up in, Maison Azuelos," Azuelos explained.

"My brother, who carried an Israeli passport, was apprehensive about how he would be treated, but I told him not to worry [because] the Moroccans are the most hospitable people in the world and will treat you with warmth and respect."

Azuelos' prediction was born out at the airport. The customs official, after inspecting Abner's passport, greeted him warmly with the words, Baruch Habah.

The family's experience was similar when they knocked on the door of the mansion which their grandfather had built. The lady of the house ushered them inside, where they were greeted with cries of Baruch Habah, embraced, kissed, and served tea and pastries.

The two families exchanged presents – the Moroccans giving traditional gifts of henna, crafts and pastries – as neighbors dropped by to join the party.

"I think the fact that we spoke Arabic to everyone made our welcome warmer," Azuelos reflected. "Many times during our trip I heard people say 'You are one of us.' We were greeted not as Jews but as Moroccans returning home."

Sitting in the intricately tiled main salon of that beautiful house, the brothers and sisters were flooded with memories of their life there. "I remember the black and white hall tile" marveled Abner, who had last seen the house 52 years ago.

"We all lived together, from great-grandfather down to us, the grandchildren, all the brothers and sisters, husbands and wives – that was the custom," Azuelos recalled.

Maison Azuelos even had its own synagogue on the ground floor. "Of course, we could make a minyan from our own family," he laughed. The synagogue, as in many Jewish homes now occupied by Arabs, was closed off out of respect, and never used.

The respect between Jews and Arabs in Fez has had a long tradition. Since the Arab occupation of Morocco in the 8th century, Jews have enjoyed special relationships with the sultans, and have been under their protection. Indeed, Azuelos' own great-grandfather was the tailor to King Hassan I, the great great-grandfather of the current king, Hassan II.

Fez was founded in the 7th century by the Muslim Arab, Moulay Idress II, who had a dream that Mohammed told him to take a pick, a fez, and build a city in that location.

The Jewish community of Morocco predated the Arabs by many centuries. Jews first settled in the area that would become Morocco after the destruction of the Second Temple and the expulsion from the Holy Land. "I am sure that my own family has been in Morocco since the time of the Spanish expulsion," Azuelos stated. Jews mixed freely with the indigenous Berber population.

After the Muslim domination of Morocco, most Jews settled in Fez where the sultan lived, to be close to his protection.

In 1276, because of Muslim sentiment that infidels should not pollute Islamic holy places, Fez was divided into sections. The medina was, henceforth, for Muslims only. Jews had to live in the area which became known as the mellah (mellah, meaning salt, denoted the less desirable dry and salted land) while Europeans were to live in the ville nouvelle. This became the model for all cities in Morocco.

Within the mellah, the Jews of Morocco developed an extremely rich cultural life. Before the birth of the State of Israel, 350,000 Jews lived in Morocco, 15,000 of them in Fez. The mellah de Fez was a centre of Jewish learning and a home to many rabbonim and chachamim. This was the community Yehuda Azuelos grew up in.

"It was definitely not a ghetto," he recalled. "We lived in the mellah but we could have lived, as many Jews did, in the nouvelle ville, or even the medina. But everything we needed for our community was available in the mellah."

With over 30 synagogues – each corner had a synagogue – the mellah offered an active, close-knit communal life. Homes were built attached together around inner courtyards and everyone knew everyone. On Friday evening, the shofar blast would denote the beginning of Shabbat and all the shops would close.

During World War II, the Vichy government had control of Morocco and Vichy officials demanded a list of Morocco's Jews. The King of Morocco refused, saying – "We don't have any Jews here, only Moroccans." Moroccans proudly claim that no Jew was ever deported from their country to the concentration camps.

When the State of Israel came into being in 1948, the first great exodus of Moroccan Jews took place."It was not persecution that made people leave," Azuelos explained. "We wanted to go to Israel. The dream, L'Shana haba'a b'Yerushalayim was very strong within our community."

After the Six Day War, however, Jews began to feel unwelcome in Morocco and the second exodus took place. "But there was," Azuelos recalled, "still no official discrimination and the King of Morocco wanted the Jews to stay."

Today there are approximately 5,000 Jews in Morocco, mostly in Casablanca. The small Jewish community of Fez has a population of 150, but has Jewish schools, synagogues, a community centre with a kosher restaurant, and kosher food readily available in the stores.

The Azuelos clan wandered the labyrinthian streets of the mellah and medina, savoring the rich smells and sounds of their childhood. "I felt as if I had travelled back into the middle ages," remarked Azuelos' son, Alan, who was born in Canada. No cars could fit the narrow streets which were barely wide enough for two people to walk abreast. Goods were carried to the stores by donkey.

A highlight of the trip was the family visit to the Jewish cemetery located at the entrance of the mellah. This too, was a labyrinth. In a manner similar to the houses they had lived in, the Jews of Fez were laid to rest in graves closely attached to each other.

With the help of Edmond Gaby of the Jewish Historical Society (who had computerized all the graves and names in the cemetery), the Azuelos clan were able to locate their family's graves. They said Tehillim, laid stones and recorded the birth and death dates of all their great-grandparents.

The climax of the trip was the dedication ceremony for the Ibn Danan Synagogue. It was an international occasion drawing officials from various cities in Morocco and France and many former Moroccans from all over the world.

Taking part in the ceremony were: Andre Azoulay, conseiller (adviser) to the King of Morocco; Wali Hady M' Hamed Dryef, governor of Grand Fez; Grand Rabbi of Paris David Messas; Grand Rabbi of France Rene Samuel Sirat; and Grand Rabbi of Morocco Aharon Monsonego.

There had been no rain in Morocco for months, but on the morning the crowd gathered at the entrance of the mellah to walk to the Ibn Danan Synagogue, a gentle rain started to fall – a happy omen. Two sefer Torahs were taken from the Ville Nouvelle Synagogue and the entire crowd walked through the old Jewish quarter singing prayers and ululating, Moroccan-style.

People stopped to watch and clapped as the parade wound through the streets. Inside the ancient synagogue, the ornately decorated walls once more rang with the sounds of Jewish chanting, as the daily prayer service was led by the Grand Rabbi of Paris.

Yehuda Azuelos stood where his ancestors had prayed for 500 years, and with both joy and sorrow in his heart, reflected on the long history of the Jewish community of Fez.

Jews mourn death of King Hassan; greet new monarch

By GIL SEDAN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — The death of Morocco's King Hassan II made tens of thousands of Israelis mourn for the man they consider "their" king – and homesick for the land their families left.

Young Israelis of Moroccan origin placed the Moroccan flag on top of their cars, while others displayed huge posters in their homes of the late king, who died last Friday of a heart attack at the age of 70.

The Moroccan Jewish community in Israel declared a seven-day period of mourning for the king.

While reaction from Israel's leadership was perhaps less dramatic, it was just as heartfelt – as a delegation led by Israeli President Ezer Weizman and Prime Minister Ehud Barak joined 30 world leaders, including U.S. President Bill Clinton and Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat, in remembering a man who played a vital role in bridging the gap between the Jewish state and the Arab world.

In a condolence message, Weizman called Hassan a "true partner in the peace process."

Attending the funeral, Barak called Hassan a "great leader," adding that the late monarch was a "farsighted man, a friend to the governments of Israel in their voyage toward peace with the Arab people."

In Israel, Moroccan Jews have traditionally supported parties such as Likud or Shas, that espouse hardline policies toward the Arab countries. This is partly to compensate for the fact that they felt "Ashkenazi Jews regarded them as Jewish Arabs," according to Haim Shiran, 64, director of Inbal, an ethnic centre in Tel Aviv. He said anti-Arab political views were a kind of self-defence mechanism, a way to distinguish themselves from the Arabs.

But when it came to the king's death, the reaction of Israel's estimated 300,000 Moroccan Jews appeared similar to that of Morocco's Arab residents, many of whom consider the king to be a direct descendent of the Muslim prophet Mohammad.

"I know that it may sound ridiculous," said Shiran, "but when, on Friday, I saw the Moroccan announcer on television announcing the death of the king, I broke out in tears."

Actor Ze'ev Revah added: "I feel as if I have lost a member of the family."

When King Hassan II took power in 1961 after the death of his father Mohammed V, he was an unknown quantity with a reputation as a playboy. But ruling with a deft mixture of pro-Western democracy and traditional autocracy, he earned the respect of his people. He also survived several coup attempts, including one in which he reportedly pacified an attacker by reciting the opening verses of the Koran.

Hassan is being succeeded by his son Mohammed, 36.

As his father was when he ascended the throne, Mohammed VI is an unknown quantity. But most observers, citing the new monarch's knowledge of four languages and his degree from a French university, believe he will continue, and perhaps even accelerate, his father's pro-Western and pro-peace policies.

Mohammed V is widely credited with having saved Morocco's Jews from deportation during World War II, and Hassan continued the philo-Semitic policies of his father. Although there was an outbreak of anti-Jewish incidents following the establishment of the State of Israel in 1948, the Jewish community was generally safe under the protection of both Mohammed and Hassan, who proudly considered the Jews "Moroccans of Jewish origin."

When tens of thousands of Jews left Morocco in a massive aliyah that began after Morocco gained its independence in 1956 – and accelerated after Hassan II gained power – it was due as much to Zionism and a desire for economic opportunity as it was to a fear of anti-Semitism.

And as absorption difficulties mounted, Moroccan Jews missed the country of their birth even more.

"Even the death of your own premier you haven't mourned as deeply," Pinhas Suissa, 44, a building contractor from Jerusalem said to his friends.

The response was simple: "[Yitzhak] Rabin was a prime minister, elected for only four years. The king was king for life."

Along with the recently deceased King Hussein of Jordan, Hassan was considered a moderate in the Middle East. During his 38-year reign, he discreetly, and later openly, promoted ties with Israel at a time when most of the rest of the Arab world rejected such contact.

In the 1967 and 1973 wars, he contributed only a nominal number of troops to support the Arab world.

His mediation efforts, including secret meetings with Israeli intelligence officials and political leaders, helped pave the way for the 1978 Camp David accord between Israel and Egypt.

King Hassan also played a role in preparing for the 1991 Madrid peace conference and welcomed then-prime minister Yitzhak Rabin in September 1993, making Morocco the first Arab nation outside of Egypt to officially welcome an Israeli leader. In 1994, Hassan hosted the first Middle East regional economic conference that included Israel.

Bomb discovered in Moscow shul heightens security fears

By LEV KRICHEVSKY
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

MOSCOW — A rabbi's 12-year-old son has prevented a bomb from going off inside a Moscow synagogue.

The incident at the Bolshaya Bronnaya shul – in which no one was hurt – came less than two weeks after a Moscow Jewish leader was stabbed inside another synagogue in the Russian capital.

The incident is likely to exacerbate already-simmering anger within the Jewish community as promises for heightened security at Jewish sites continue to go unmet.

The son of Lubavitch Rabbi Itzhak Kogan discovered the bomb in the synagogue's main hall a few minutes before a ceremony for a young boy's first haircut was set to begin. The synagogue was packed with a large number of small children and was decorated with balloons.

A bomb squad detonated the explosive nearby. The explosion shattered window panes at the shul and in neighboring buildings.

"It's a miracle that no one was hurt," Rabbi Kogan told JTA, minutes after the bomb was detonated.

Dozens of Jews who were evacuated from the synagogue burst into applause when they heard the powerful explosion.

"It could have gone off when we were inside," said a young woman who was inside the shul when the bomb was found. "I still can't believe it. We could have been killed," she said.

According to a federal security service agent who did not give his name, the bomb contained an equivalent of more than one pound of TNT.

In the wake of the July 13 stabbing of Leopold Kaimovsky at the Choral Synagogue, Russian authorities vowed to tighten up security measures at all Moscow synagogues that are currently guarded by private security agencies.

These promises have yet to be fulfilled.

Jewish officials say they are not surprised, because a similar failure to follow up on security promises occurred after bomb blasts near two Moscow synagogues in May.

In the meantime, Jewish communal leaders are busy upgrading security measures themselves at Jewish sites in Russia.

The changes are evident at the Choral Synagogue, where visitors are now required to pass though an airport-style security system.

Jewish officials say they are preparing to introduce similar measures, which have become commonplace in many Moscow restaurants and office buildings, at most Jewish sites in Moscow and elsewhere in Russia.

Currently, only two Moscow synagogues have adequate security systems, while schools, offices of Jewish organizations and soup kitchens lack even the basic measures.

Increased security, of course, translates into increased costs, and with this in mind, the Moscow community established a special foundation to raise funds in Russia and abroad to provide communal institutions with updated security.

"We are witnessing a surge of anti-Semitism. This does not mean that people don't see a future here anymore. What we have to do now is to struggle for this future, to learn to protect ourselves," said Pavel Feldblum, the executive vice-president of the newly created Moscow Jewish Community.

The community, created recently by 40 prominent Jews, is seeking to unite the Jewish organizations that operate in Moscow.

As its first goal, the Moscow Jewish Community plans to raise and distribute $800,000 for existing communal projects in the capital.

"The overall goal of the new structure is to raise Jewish pride and Jewish self-consciousness" among non-affiliated Jews, said Moscow's chief rabbi, Pinchas Goldschmidt.

Goldschmidt said that when more prominent figures are not ashamed to publicly associate with the community, more Russian Jews will publicly affirm their Jewish roots.

Meanwhile, reports in the mainstream Russian press this week are accelerating concerns about an even larger surge in anti-Semitism.

Several newspapers criticized former Russian Prime Minister Viktor Chernomyrdin for saying that a battle between two of Russia's leading business tycoons was a struggle between "two Jews."

Commenting on an unprecedented media war between the ORT channel, controlled by Boris Berezovsky, and NTV, owned by Vladimir Goussinsky, Chernomyrdin told a news conference in Moscow, "it comes out that two Jews have clashed, and now the whole country has to watch this farce."

Many Jewish officials and ordinary Jews said they were shocked by the comment from Chernomyrdin, who had not previously made public anti-Semitic remarks.

In a front-page article, Russia's leading business daily Kommersant wrote that the remark was an indication of a looming "anti-Semitic epidemic" in advance of this December's parliamentary election.

Russian aliyah jumps 128 percent

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

MOSCOW — The immigration of Russian Jews to Israel is reaching its highest levels since the mass exodus of the late 1980s and early 1990s, according to the Jewish Agency for Israel.

"If the trend continues, the number of Russian Jews [making aliyah] might reach 30,000" this year, which would be the highest number since 1992, Jewish Agency Chairman Sallai Meridor said recently.

Immigration from Russia is being fueled by the country's economic crisis and fears of rising anti-Semitism, agency officials said.

During the first six months of 1999, 12,188 Russian Jews came to Israel, which is a 128 percent increase over the same period last year.

Russian Jewish emigres represented nearly half of the 25,516 Jews who made aliyah from across the former Soviet Union (FSU) during this time.

In previous years, Jewish emigres from Russia only accounted for some 30 percent of the total number of olim from the FSU.

A total of 60,000 emigres from the FSU are expected to make aliyah during 1999. Last year there were 46,000.

Some 800,000 Jews from the FSU have made aliyah since 1989, when Soviet leader Mikhail Gorbachev approved more liberal emigration policies. —L.K.

Stalin's grandson blames Jews

By LEV KRICHEVSKY
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

MOSCOW — A grandson of Stalin has found a familiar target for Russia's current woes – the Jews.

Yevgeny Dzhugashvili charged that "Zionists" are ravaging Russia and that there are "practically no [ethnic] Russians" in the current Russian Cabinet, the Interfax news agency reported.

The statement was similar to a series of anti-Semitic remarks made in recent months by prominent members of the Communist Party, who charged that there have been too many Jews in the government of Russian President Boris Yeltsin and that they are responsible for Russia's ongoing economic and social problems.

Russia's 30-member government includes two officials with known Jewish roots.

Stalin was responsible for several cruel waves of persecution in the Soviet Union, including some that involved anti-Semitism.

Dzhugashvili, a retired air force colonel, was speaking to a crowd of 100 supporters of several radical leftists groups that rallied near Moscow's Red Square to protest Russian President Boris Yeltsin's reported intention to bury Lenin's embalmed body.

Earlier this year, Dzhugashvili launched a new leftist electoral coalition called the Stalinist Bloc. The bloc, which supports the reconstitution of the Soviet Union, is composed of radical leftist and anti-Semitic elements.

Dzhugashvili, who like other descendants of Stalin kept a low profile during the later years of the Soviet Union, lives in the former Soviet republic of Georgia, where he heads the 50,000-member Stalin Society.

Dzhugashvili has made several thinly veiled anti-Semitic remarks in the past. Earlier this year, he was quoted as saying at a public rally that "in contrast to the war against Nazi Germany, the enemy today is among us and hiding."

Stalin unleashed a state-sponsored anti-Semitic campaign in the Soviet Union after World War II. The campaign, which included the notorious Doctors' Plot, in which several Jewish doctors were killed after having been falsely accused of murdering Soviet leaders, and a drive against "rootless cosmopolitans" – a code word for Jews – ended after Stalin died in March 1953. —L.K.

Jews mourn death of King

After the euphoria of the 1993 Oslo accords between Israel and the Palestinians, Israel was allowed to establish a consular office in Rabat, and an estimated 40,000 Israeli tourists visited Morocco in 1995 and 1996. But after the peace process stalled following the election of Benjamin Netanyahu, relations cooled considerably. Moroccan ministers were not allowed to meet with Israel's consul general in their offices.

There were indications, however, that relations were set to improve once again with the renewed optimism in the peace process spurred by Barak's election in May. Before Hassan's death last Friday, Morocco's trade office in Israel commemorated its move from Tel Aviv to new offices in an ornate replica of one of King Hassan's palaces built in the southern port city of Ashdod.

Speculation before the funeral focused on the possibility of a meeting between Barak and Syrian President Hafez al-Assad.

But Assad did not attend the funeral, reportedly because of American efforts to set up such a meeting. Assad, who sent a deputy in his place, was slated to visit Morocco on Tuesday to pay his respects to Mohammed, according to Israeli press reports.

Separate meetings between Barak and Arafat and Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak slated for last weekend were postponed because of Hassan's death and rescheduled for Tuesday evening and Thursday.

But even in death Hassan provided an opportunity for Israeli and Arab officials to meet – in this case, an unprecedented exchange between Barak, Israeli Foreign Minister David Levy and Algerian President Abdelaziz Bouteflika.

The Week in Israel

July 19

• The IDF began preparations for transferring a regional headquarters in the West Bank. The work being carried out near Jenin, marks the first time since the elections in May that the army has prepared for a further withdrawal in the West Bank.

July 20

• Prime Minister Ehud Barak asked Jewish members of Congress to stop supporting "ill-timed" initiatives, including those that would strengthen Israeli control over Jerusalem. He added that such moves could frustrate his efforts to improve the atmosphere for making peace with the Palestinians and Syria.

• Interior Minister Natan Sharansky said he plans to end the practice of revoking the residency permits of Arab residents of Jerusalem who lived abroad.

July 21

• A new political party with two legislators was recognized by the Knesset. Roman Bronfman and Alexander Tzinker formed the Machar party soon after they joined the Knesset as part of the Yisrael Ba'Aliyah ticket. There are now a record 16 political parties in the Knesset.

• Israel's security is threatened by growing societal rifts, the head of the Shin Bet told a conference at Tel Aviv University. Israeli society is "divided and polarized," said Ami Ayalon. "Victory has as much – if not more – to do with people, with their will-power" as with technological know-how, he added.

July 22

• The military wing of Hamas is threatening to renew its terrorist attacks in Israel's large cities in the near future according to a leaflet that was disseminated in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip. The leaflet was attributed to Is a Din al Kassam, the armed branch of the Gaza-based Hamas movement.

July 23

• The United States made it clear to Israel that it views implementation of the Wye Accord as the top priority on the road to renewing the peace process.

Barak ends U.S. visit with bag of "gestures"

By MATTHEW DORF
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

WASHINGTON — Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Barak wanted to send a message to his country's Arab neighbors that the U.S.-Israeli relationship has recovered from the tensions that had marked the tenure of his predecessor, Benjamin Netanyahu.

President Bill Clinton helped deliver the message last week – providing glowing endorsements of the premier, holding an unusual 15 hours of meetings with Barak, agreeing to regular visits and establishing a new joint security commission.

During a six-day visit, Barak and Clinton seemed to present a united vision of how to move the peace process forward. Barak made it clear that he wanted to set a 15-month timetable for establishing a framework for comprehensive peace agreements with the Palestinians, Syria and Lebanon.

If the Palestinian reaction to his visit is any indication, Barak's message was heard loud and clear.

Concerned that Barak had succeeded in convincing Clinton to shift the American role away from mediator, which had during recent years of stalemate worked to the Palestinians' advantage, Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat dispatched one of his top deputies, Abu Mazen, to Washington to monitor Barak's visit.

Back in Gaza, another top Palestinian peace negotiator loudly complained about Barak's efforts.

"The American role must be defined in accordance with American interests, and it's not up to Barak to define this role," Saeb Erekat was quoted as saying, according to a report by Associated Press.

Palestinians complained about Barak

Barak's call for the United States to pursue the peace process as Israel's partner "is totally rejected by us," Erekat said.

At the end of his U.S. visit, Barak left Washington with a host of American gestures of support:

• Clinton and Barak agreed to establish the Strategic Policy Planning Group to bolster Israel's defence and deterrence capabilities. The group will meet at four-month intervals, and the two leaders agreed to meet regularly to review its recommendations.

• Clinton and Barak put into writing a previously agreed-upon formula to reduce U.S. economic aid to Israel, currently close to $1 billion a year, by $120 million a year for the next eight years. At the same time U.S. military aid to Israel would increase by $60 million a year.

At the end of the 10-year period, Israel would receive $2.4 billion a year in military aid. The codification of the agreements, subject to congressional approval, is expected to curb the White House efforts to eliminate the economic aid sooner.

Israel to receive $2.4 billion in military aid

• Clinton promised to go to Congress to seek an additional $1.2 billion in aid for the region – $400 million will be allocated to the Palestinians and $300 million to the Jordanians.

This aid package was promised during last October's Wye peace talks. Except for a partial payment to Jordan, the aid was never delivered because of the stalemate in the peace process.

• Clinton agreed to pay an estimated $200 million for a third Arrow missile battery, which is designed to destroy incoming missiles.

• An Israeli astronaut and some Israeli experiments will be launched on a U.S. space shuttle next year, and Clinton and Barak agreed to establish a committee made up of NASA and the Israel Space Agency representatives for the development of practical applications in the peaceful use of space.

"America and Israel will be taking our partnership to new heights – literally," Clinton said.

For his part, Barak had a few gestures for the president. In addition to praising his leadership on the Kosovo crisis, he intercepted a question for Clinton on Jonathan Pollard at a joint news conference.

Taking the pressure off of Clinton to respond, Barak said, "I clearly want to see Jonathan Pollard released, but I am of the position that any public discussion of this issue doesn't push forward the purpose of having him released.

"For many reasons, this is a subject that should be dealt with not in public, but at most between the leaders of the two nations."

During his meeting with Clinton, Barak raised the Pollard issue and suggested separating the fate of Pollard from the peace process, according to information from Clinton's national security adviser, Sandy Berger.

Britain refused wartime plan to rescue Jews

By DOUGLAS DAVIS
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

LONDON — The British government blocked a secret U.S. plan that would have saved thousands of Jews from Nazi concentration camps, because Britain feared they would settle in Palestine, according to newly released British documents.

The plan would have involved the exchange of captive Jews in Germany and German-occupied territory who held South American passports for German nationals in Latin America.

But Britain's foreign secretary, Anthony Eden, rejected the June 14, 1944 proposal because he feared the freed Jews would stir up trouble for Britain if they immigrated to Palestine, a Foreign Office document shows.

Eden was also concerned that the return of able-bodied Germans might contribute to the Nazi war effort.

Britain's refusal to contemplate the exchange plan angered Washington, where politicians had been shocked by the malnourished, emaciated condition of prisoners from Bergen-Belsen who had been released in an earlier civilian exchange.

U.S. officials suggested the plan after diplomats noted that many Germans were interned or under effective house arrest in Latin American countries, while thousands of concentration camp inmates were Latin American citizens or their dependents.

Eden, however, was unimpressed with the plan.

"Most of the holders of these documents [Latin American passports] are of the Jewish race who have been accepted as immigrants to Palestine," he wrote in November 1944 to the British ambassador in Uruguay, Gordon Vereker.

"The passports are good for a journey thither, provided the holders succeed in leaving enemy or enemy-occupied territory," he added.

"In these circumstances, it appears doubtful that it will ever be possible to carry out the exchange envisaged by the United States government."

Eden expressed the hope, however, that "the German government [would] abstain from exterminating these people and [would] keep them in camps open to outside inspection" if it was made aware that they might be exchanged for Germans.

British diplomats in South America also argued about the lists of German citizens prepared by the United States.

"All of them are capable of rendering services to Germany if in that country," Vereker wrote. "Many have qualities that would render them of considerable value to Germany.

"For instance, it seems absurd to suggest sending to Germany," he added, "highly trained employees of the German bank who otherwise are languishing here doing nothing but draw their pay.

"Any such action would certainly be misunderstood and give rise to all sorts of ideas that we have gone all soft and sentimental over the Germans."

In February 1945, the U.S. State Department was so exasperated by Britain's procrastination that an emotional memo was sent to London: "The department has received most distressing reports regarding physical conditions of the unfortunate persons from Bergen-Belsen camp who were released in the latest exchange of civilians, and it will be noted that five of them died of malnutrition during a short period after their arrival in Switzerland. A sixth has died this week.

"It is therefore a matter of the greatest humanitarian urgency that cleared lists of Germans in this hemisphere available for exchange be compiled and that they comprise enough persons to permit the release from confinement and otherwise certain death of the several thousand unfortunate bearers of Latin American passports whom the Germans are holding under such conditions."

However, by the time Lord Halifax, then British ambassador in Washington, sent the note to Vereker, progress in the war had made the plan "of academic interest," according to a document.

Ironically, after the war, Britain's diplomats in South America found themselves frustrated by U.S. obstruction of plans to expatriate "obnoxious Germans."

George Ogilvie Forbes, then British ambassador to Venezuela, remarked on the "indifference" of Americans to the plans even though "the elimination of obnoxious Germans from this territory really concerns the U.S. much more than Britain."

The documents were not scheduled to be released until 2021, but were released by the Public Records Office in London this week under the Open Government Initiative.

At last count, the annual volume of trade was $600 million (US), a figure he expects will grow to $1 billion within five years.

In an interview at Canada's new embassy in Yad Elyahu, which is less than a block from the Gottex swimsuit factory, Berger said he had a finger in many pies in an effort to bolster Canada's relationship with Israel.

He worked with Canadian companies such as Air Canada, which increased its flights to Israel, and Canadian Highways International Corp., which won a $1.2 billion contract to build a major road in Israel.

He played a role in Montreal builder David Azrieli's decision to construct a skyscraper in the heart of Tel Aviv.

He involved himself in the activities of the Canada-Israel Industrial Research & Development Foundation, whose objective is to promote collaborative work in both countries.

He promoted tourism at Canadian travel seminars.

On the diplomatic front, he said, Canada contributed to the Oslo peace process in two ways. Canada chaired the refugee working group in the multilateral track, and assisted in the repatriation of several thousand stranded Palestinian refugees from Egypt to the Gaza Strip.

There is one episode of his ambassadorship he would much rather forget – the 1997 Khaled Meshaal affair, which erupted when Israeli Mossad agents, in possession of forged Canadian passports, tried but failed to kill a leading Hamas official in Amman, Jordan.

As a result of this international incident, Berger was pointedly recalled to Ottawa for consultations, and Israel promised not to misuse Canadian passports ever again.

Suggesting that the Meshaal affair has had no lasting impact on Canada's relations with Israel, Berger noted: "Basically, Canada has accepted Israeli assurances. We have no reason to believe that Israel is not living up to these assurances."

Turning to personal matters, Berger said he had amassed unforgettable memories of Israel. Yet two, both involving Yitzhak Rabin in the last weeks of his life, vividly stand out in his mind.

When Rabin addressed a Canadian Jewish delegation at a dinner at the Israel Museum in Jerusalem, he revealed a rarely seen human side of himself in an animated speech about a recent trip to the former Soviet Union.

And on the night Rabin was murdered in Tel Aviv, Berger, his wife Monica Ewart and friends attended the peace rally where he was gunned down by Yigal Amir.

They left before the shots rang out, but the memory lingers on. The assassination, he said, was a warning to Israeli society that violent language and violent behavior can have disastrous consequences.

Born in Ottawa, and educated at the University of Toronto and McGill, Berger was vice-president of the Montreal Alouettes football team and president of the Canadian Football League before being elected to the House of Commons in 1979.

He jumped at the opportunity

As an MP, Berger was parliamentary secretary to the Ministry of State (small business and tourism) and later to the minister of consumer and corporate affairs. In addition, he was chair of the committee on industry.

When Chretien offered him the ambassadorship, which until recently included representation to the Palestinian autonomous areas, he jumped at the opportunity. "I had a longstanding interest in Israel and in the Arab-Israeli conflict," he said. And, he added, Israel was not exactly terra incognita. He had already visited Israel several times, first setting foot on Israeli soil in the late 1960s when he joined his parents and brother on a trip.

Yet, when his appointment was announced, there was an outcry in certain quarters. The president of the Ottawa-based Professional Association of Foreign Service Officers lambasted it as a "political appointment."

Meanwhile, the National Council of Canada-Arab Relations charged that Berger – the second Canadian Jewish ambassador to Israel after Norman Spector – was anti-Palestinian because, among other things, he had defended a visit to Canada in 1983 by Ariel Sharon only months after the Sabra and Shatila massacre in Lebanon.

Due, perhaps, to these accusations, Berger is exceedingly careful. In advance of this interview, his secretary requested a copy of the questions which would be posed. And during the meeting, he occasionally glanced at typed notes.

Berger, however, was rarely at a loss for words, and he vigorously defended himself in the face of insinuations that he was unqualified to be ambassador.

"The proof of the pudding is in the eating," he said. "Both Israelis and Palestinians are sorry to see me leaving."

What will he do now? "I haven't totally decided what to do next, but after nearly 20 years in public life, the private sector has a certain attraction."

Berger, almost certainly, will return to the region as a businessman. What about a comeback in Canadian politics? "I think it's unlikely, although life is full of surprises."

As he prepares to leave his official residence in Savyon with his wife and children Laura, Philippe and Sarah, Berger said he will miss his friends, the Hebrew language, the Jewish calendar, the music, the songs and the sheer pace of life in Israel.

And, he confessed, he will miss being Canada's ambassador to Israel.

GREEKTOWN ON THE DANFORTH

Korry's exemplifies the Greektown experience

Beauty is truth, truth beauty,' — that is all
Ye know on earth, and all ye need to know.
— John Keats, Ode on a Grecian Urn

Had Keats been alive today, he might well have penned these lines while sipping a coffee in one of the Danforth's fine cafés. Is the Danforth beautiful? Yes. And true: its beauty is more than skin deep. Like a living, breathing entity, the street oozes substance and style from every pore. At its hub is Korry's, the menswear store whose founder, Saul Korman, would just as soon talk about the street as his own store. Just so long as he's talking.

At this moment, however, the subject is menswear. Korman often alludes to the value Korry's offers. Less frequently addressed is the issue of price in absolute terms. When asked to explain the value of a $500 suit versus the $250 variety, Korman is quick to respond.

"Go to your wardrobe. Look at all the garments in your closet. Suits, slacks, shirts — everything. And ask yourself this question: Of the ones you wear again and again — the ones that demand to be worn because of all the positive feedback you get on them, and the way that makes you feel — how many did you buy cheap?"

Almost invariably, says Korman, the answer is none. Hidden away in a corner, fraying or already consigned to the recycling heap, the garments you thought you'd saved on have become albatrosses — unpleasant reminders of the old adage, You Get What You Pay For. "Those "deals" turned out to be the most expensive things you ever bought," he notes.

But quality alone is not enough, says Korman. "It's just the beginning. The quality garments you buy have to be right for you, and they have to be properly coordinated. A good salesperson can help you avoid the pitfalls of improper coordination — and having your wife or girlfriend along doesn't hurt either." Women, explains Korman, usually have a highly refined sense of colour coordination, and they know what looks good on their man.

At the time he purchases a suit or other garment, a man often "isn't sure how much he likes it. That's fine; that's normal. Over time, the feedback he gets from other people will corroborate someone's taste — either his, or the person who helped him choose it." Invariably, says Korman, the customer who values others' expert opinions over his own comes out ahead. "This applies to me too," he says. "When I go shopping, I shut up and listen."

We'd love to be there.

In a Danforth reign that spans 47 years, Korman has seen many informal titles bestowed on him, from "King of the Danforth" to "The Mayor" (with apologies to Mel Lastman). His favourite, though, is "Mentor", which he finds particularly flattering in light of his lack of higher education. Having graduated magna cum laude from the school of hard knocks, Korman is now a highly articulate spokesman not only for Korry's but also for the Danforth, whose virtues he extolls daily on the local airwaves. In the live, unrehearsed radio and television spots that have become his trademark, Korman has established a new standard for spontaneity in advertising. Delighting some listeners and viewers while annoying others, he leaves no one indifferent. "You don't have to love me," interjects Korman, "but you've gotta love the Danforth."

Those who come inevitably do. The street's uniquely European flavour and flair make it a favourite destination not only of native Torontonians but also of people from other cities, especially Montreal. As one ex-Montrealer remarked, "It's the one street in Toronto that reminds me of home."

Less known is the fact that two Danforth synagogues — one orthodox, the other reform — allow the Greek experience to dovetail nicely with the Jewish experience. Even if you're not visiting the Danforth to attend a service, "it's nice to know they're there", says Korman.

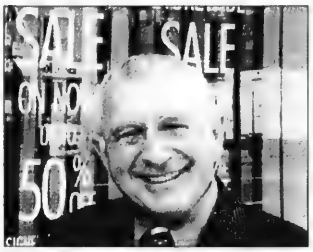
Recently renovated, Korry's marries style and substance



Saul Korman — still going strong after all these years

While Korry's recent major renovation now gives it the cutting-edge look of a Milan boutique, it has retained its characteristic earthiness and warmth. It was important for Korry's to harmonize with the street, says Saul, because "we're a part of something that's bigger than ourselves." And the whole — the Danforth experience — is something that more and more people have come to enjoy. "There are close to a million people out there who agree with us," he beams, in reference to the expected attendance at this year's Krinos Foods Taste of the Danforth, August 6 to 8.

Taste of the Danforth attests to street's cachet

Unlike shopping malls which have to "create environment because they have no environment to begin with," says Korman, the Danforth's environment "is here. See it. Touch it. Taste it. Spend five minutes on the Danforth, and tell me I'm wrong."

Your five minutes will undoubtedly stretch into five hours, and that's fine — the Danforth just feels right in so many ways. We'll use the extra time to kick back, relax, and smell the roses. And we're dying to tell Korman he's wrong about something.

Health and taste reign at Mezes

One trend that has gained momentum in recent years is the emphasis on healthy eating, both inside the home and out. No longer is it sufficient for restaurants to please your palate; they must now also nurture your well-being.

Front and centre in this movement is Mezes, where Sue Zindros and her sister Christine, the head chef, have staked their reputation on innovative cuisine that combines freshness and quality in equal measure. Nightly lineups attest to the success of this formula, to which the sisters unwaveringly adhere.

"Healthy eating is not a bonus, it's a given," says Sue. "The question isn't if your ingredients are pure and fresh, but how pure and fresh they are. We don't serve anything here that we wouldn't serve in our own home, because, when our customers come here, this is their home."

Furthermore, says Sue, customers do compare the dishes they eat in restaurants with those they prepare in their own kitchen, and are entitled to expect the same high standards and superb taste. Consistency is critical, she notes; the same quality must be maintained day after day, week after week. Despite widespread public acclaim, "we never act like we've "made it." We feel that we have to prove ourselves daily, both in the way we feed people and in the way we treat them."

Can you taste the difference that purity makes? To the unrefined palate, olive oil is olive oil; to the afficionado, however, the first-cold-pressed, extra-virgin variety used at Mezes is magical, as are the fresh herbs that flavour and garnish almost every dish.

Vegetarian dishes, often a bland letdown elsewhere, are terrifically zesty; the entire menu, in fact, will redefine your notions of Greek cuisine and raise the bar on your expectations. The fresh fish is heavenly, the selection marvellous. Try the lamb chops — the ultimate test — and you'll understand why Mezes has gone to the head of the class.

Dishes are prepared slowly, lovingly, one by one, and they keep customers coming back in droves. Always active but never too busy to welcome you warmly, Mezes is the quintessential Greek restaurant.

GREEKTOWN ON THE DANFORTH

Astoria's souvlaki judged best in major media polls

Think "Danforth", and you're liable to think "Astoria." In the 21 years since it opened, this venerable "institution of higher dining" has come to symbolize the culinary qualities the Danforth is known for: great food, great quality, and great value.

Indeed, many of Astoria's original customers are still regulars two decades later, and wouldn't dream of going anywhere else.

Astoria's now-famous "souvlaki window", always a beehive of activity, is an indelible image of Danforth life. And what souvlaki! Judged "Best of the City" by Toronto Life (1998) and "Best of Toronto" by Now Magazine (1997), Astoria's souvlaki helped make it a multiple winner of the Toronto Sun's Readers' Choice Award as Toronto's favourite Greek restaurant. Other jewels on the menu include hearty moussaka, exquisite broiled sea bass and salmon steaks – and Greek appetizers like kalamari and saganaki, if you can keep your souvlaki craving at bay long enough to sample them.

Location and atmosphere are other Astoria assets. For a big restaurant, it's remarkably cozy, due to its corner location, dual outdoor patios (the Danforth's largest), and quiet, richly appointed interior.

Heading eastbound on Bloor, you know you're on the Danforth once you hit Broadview; but you don't really feel it until Astoria's white facade with its pale blue trim leaps joyously into view, bidding you "Welcome to the Danforth" in words that the food lover in you understands so well.

Palace thanks loyal customers

Every restaurant needs a loyal following to survive and thrive. In the case of The Palace, the clientele's devotion knows no bounds — a fact for which owner Peter Hadjis is eternally grateful.

Many of his current customers followed him to The Palace from the Royal York Hotel, where he honed his culinary skills before opening The Palace in 1984. He rewards their loyalty daily, not only with his legendary cuisine — the Danforth's finest — but also with the genuine warmth and affection he displays each time they visit. The key, he says, is never taking anything or anyone for granted; "I'm flattered each time someone chooses me," he says. "I treat it like a marriage proposal."

Mention you saw this, and enjoy a free appetizer with your meal Aug. 2–8

We'll hope his wife isn't reading this. Since you are, however, just mention it and he'll be happy to treat you to a free appetizer with your lunch or dinner during the week of August 2–8.

There are many reasons to "propose" to The Palace. From the oven-baked stuffed lamb to the Danforth's largest selection of fresh fish, The Palace leads the way in signature dishes. Some special entrées must even be ordered in advance, and The Palace offers many non-mainstream dishes you won't find anywhere else.

The Palace's huge skylit party room on the second floor is perfect for birthday parties and other special occasions — though you'll find that at The Palace, every meal is a special occasion.

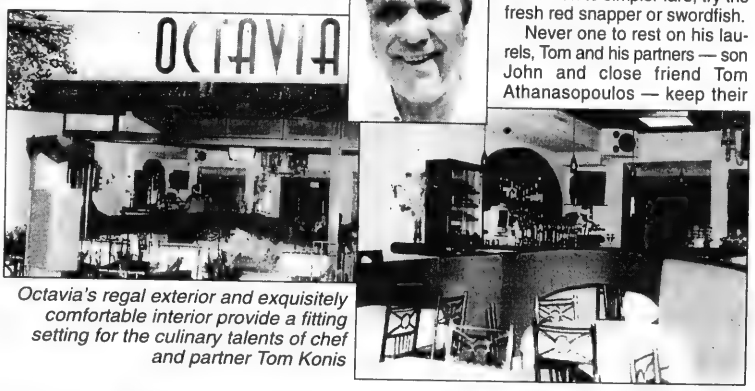
Octavia an oasis of comfort and a boon to the taste buds

Everything you'd expect from a Greek restaurant and everything you wouldn't, Octavia is one dining spot you simply have to experience in person to fully appreciate. One year after its grand opening, it continues to surprise and delight Danforth-goers with culinary innovations matched by its equally unique decor.

What you would expect (exemplary Greek cuisine, open patio, and welcoming atmosphere) is here in spades. What you wouldn't expect (scintillating twists on some old Greek favourites, intimate semi-circular booths that evoke a '40's Chicago nightclub, and a cigar lounge) blend together so seamlessly that you're seduced by them quicker than you can say "Tom Konis".

We should have known that the founder of fond Memories would have a few gourmet tricks up his sleeve. From Chicken Souvlaki that's marinated in rosemary until it fairly sings de Deux on Tom's menu. Tom's version of Veal Marsala will relegate all previous recipes you've tasted to the back burner. Madagascar green peppercorns add zing to U.S. prime steak, and this is one Greek restaurant where you won't feel obliged to order steak in an apologetic whisper.



Octavia's regal exterior and exquisitely comfortable interior provide a fitting setting for the culinary talents of chef and partner Tom Konis

If crossing two cultures isn't enough, how about the Greek Spring Roll — succulent slivers of chicken intermingled with three colours of peppers, garnished with tzatziki and fresh herbs, then snugly wrapped in a delicately toasted pita. You've never, ever tasted anything like it.

Greek spring rolls a taste sensation to the Baby Back Ribs Oregano, Greek and Continental entrées perform a Pas

Even the traditional Greek fare is deliciously different. Filet of sole is broiled, Athenian style, on a bed of fresh spinach with feta cheese and wine sauce. If your tastes run to simpler fare, try the fresh red snapper or swordfish.

Never one to rest on his laurels, Tom and his partners — son John and close friend Tom Athanasopoulos — keep their menu on the cutting edge. Attention to detail is paramount; "we prepare everything from scratch," says John, "and we constantly evaluate every item on our menu, right down to the last dip. We are our own toughest critics."

The dips are typical of the innovations that abound on Octavia's menu. From the sharp, distinctive goat cheese dip to the zesty pesto (did you say "Opa" or "Bravo" — does it matter?), Octavia marches to its own delicious drummer.

Octavia's comfort and unparalleled intimacy makes it a true lounge, and you'll be hard-pressed to find its equal, either on the Danforth or city-wide. Its slate-tiled lower level with elegant table seating segues into the oak-floored upper, flanked on one side by the aforementioned booths, on the other by a charming, serpentine-shaped bar.

Here, after-dinner drinks are much more than an afterthought. Once you've finished your meal, an impressive selection of fine martinis await you. "When you entertain at home," says John, "your evening follows a natural progression from the dining room to the living room. Our goal was to create an environment that would allow our customers to experience this transition without leaving their seat."

The limited seating necessary to achieve this effect precludes huge numbers, which suits the partners just fine, says Tom. "It's not how many customers you serve, it's how well you serve the customers you have."

Pan gains international renown

With an eclectic menu that has earned it an international three-star reputation, Pan on the Danforth is one of a kind. Rave reviews in many major newspapers and magazines underscore Pan's commitment to excellence. Accolades like the Certificate of Distinction issued by the Zagat Survey of New York have garnered it a large American following in addition to the locals who seek out its inventive cuisine.

Described in Toronto Life's '99 Restaurant Guide as "a cool North American take on the Greek canon", Pan's menu eases you into the meal with lighter fare such as a "robust" vegetable salad, "hearty" bean soup and "exemplary" strained yogurt, then locks you in with entrées that will appeal to your most refined sense of haute cuisine. Add to this Pan's "interesting multi-national wine list", and you have all the ingredients for a perfect evening.

Fish and seafood are up-to-the-minute fresh, and you simply haven't tried moussaka until you've tasted Pan's. This is only one of many traditional favourites that take new and tangy directions in Pan's kitchen. Try the Char Grilled Loin of Lamb with a fig and orange glaze; or the Santorini Chicken, stuffed with spinach and feta cheese and served with lemon roast potato and seared rapini.

Another signature entrée is the Kakavia, a traditional seafood dish of shrimp, mussels, sea bass, calamari, onion, tomato, white wine and garlic crostinis.

Even the desserts have an originality that will engrave them in your memory. The highly addictive chocolate baklava is "thick as a double deck of cards" (Travel Holiday). It consists of "seductive sheets of housemade chocolate phyllo pasty layered with almonds, walnuts and pistachios then drizzled with Greek honey" (Now Magazine).

Sound tempting? If the baklava doesn't get you, the Greek Cheesecake undoubtedly will.

Owner Peter Kyriacou, who hails from Cyprus, treasures his clientele and considers it his "obligation" to serve dishes that differ from the mainstream. "Our customers expect the extraordinary, and we deliver. Every meal is a performance, an event."

Let the standing ovations begin.

Ouzeri thrives on fresh approach

Marrying European fine dining with Greek cuisine, the new Ouzeri has much to offer Danforth-goers.

After purchasing the popular eatery in November '97, brothers Chris and Alex Trahiotis (whose father Jim was executive chef and partner at Burlington's famed Lord Nelson Restaurant) revamped the menu with a view to offering fewer dishes but making every dish count. "We prefer to offer fifty superb selections than a hundred good ones," says Alex. "And freshness is paramount; from field to table is our modus operandi."

A cheery, festive place with much to offer

In addition to a wide variety of Greek appetizers, you'll find a few intriguing entrées available nowhere else on the Danforth. Signature dishes include the wonderfully garnished and baked Oysters Ouzeri; Chicken Parmesan; and Breaded Chicken with Wine Mushroom or Lemon Butter Sauce.

Fresh fish is available daily, and may feature Salmon, Pickerel, Rainbow Trout, or whatever catch happens to be freshest on the day you visit.

Accompany these delectables with a fine wine from Ouzeri's extensive international list and you have all the ingredients of a culinary bonanza.

Ouzeri is a cheery, festive place, especially on Tuesday nights when live Greek music plays to the wee hours. Its patio ranks among the Danforth's largest and liveliest, and the sightlines both within and without are clean. If you're a people-watcher, Ouzeri is unparalleled — not only on the Danforth, but citywide.

The service is friendly and extremely thorough, with ample wait staff to keep pace with your needs. The dining environment is immaculate, the cuisine impeccable. If you haven't visited Ouzeri recently, perhaps now is the time.

Wealth of healthy choices at Big Carrot

From humble beginnings in 1983, The Big Carrot has grown into metropolitan Toronto's largest health food store and wholistic dispensary.

Run as a co-op since its opening, The Big Carrot caters to a loyal clientele that embraces both its ethos and the products it specializes in: minimally processed, organically grown, cruelty free and environmentally safe. As it happens, many of these products are also Kosher.

Health-conscious customers seek out The Big Carrot for its extensive organic fruit and vegetable department (over 100 varieties at peak season) and its unmatched selection of organic bulk foods, dairy products, frozen foods, and packaged goods.

While most health food stores carry a few brands of a particular item, The Big Carrot often has half a dozen or more, and their well-versed staff is more than happy to help you decide which products will suit your dietary needs and your palate. If it's wheat-free — if it's dairy-free — if it's simply good for you, The Big Carrot undoubtedly has it.

The vast product selection includes a staggering variety of breads, buns, fresh-daily brick-oven bagels, flatbreads, and bread sticks — many of them wheat-free and dairy-free.

Two recent discoveries: Pacific Foods Oat Milk, an exquisite-tasting, naturally sweet alternative to real milk; and Sunnyvale Bakery manna bread — simply the moistest, most delicious bread you've ever tasted.

Among many others, the Kosher products include Crofters jams from Ontario, and Barbet jams from Israel; tetra-pac dairy-free soups (the ultimate in convenience) from Imagine; cereals from Nature's Path; soy beverages, both fresh and tetra-packed; Zaidy's soups and breads; Jersey Farm non-dairy soy yogurt; Organic Meadow yogurt and pressed cottage cheese; Barbara's fig bars; Mountain Chai tea; a wide selection of Eden organic pastas and tomato sauces; and Pacific Foods' almond and oat milks. The body care department carries Kosher essential oils from Pure-Li Natural.

Body Care, in fact, is typical of the Big Carrot difference. Already large enough to constitute a store in its own right, this section is currently expanding, as is the wholistic dispensary, to augment what is already Canada's widest selection of personal care products for the entire family, including baby.

But don't let The Big Carrot's size fool you. Through its continuing expansion, it has retained the humility and friendliness of its early years. This is a store that's down to earth in every possible sense, and a real pleasure to visit.

GREEKTOWN ON THE DANFORTH

Christina's: from cravings to star gazing

Some define a restaurant merely by its ability to satisfy their food cravings. For others, ambience is paramount. Still others insist on live entertainment. A few even like to gaze at the stars (either the celebrity or the celestial variety). It's rare to find one place that combines all of these attributes; but for many Torontonians, Christina's is that place.

Food cravings. In addition to traditional Greek fare — including the best plate of lamb chops you'll find on the Danforth — Christina's solves your Greek/Italian culinary dichotomies by offering wonderful pasta/souvlaki combos. Their filet of sole in a killer garlic sauce is a must-try. And their treatment of salads (romaine and organic baby green lettuce are used instead of leaf and iceberg) is typical of a menu-wide provision of quality ingredients. This is not a fast-food restaurant; you may wait a little longer for your food to arrive, but the wait is well worth it.

Ambience. Christina's has Character with a capital "C". Much of that character, of course, comes from the clientele, which echoes Christina's universal appeal; on any given night, you'll find almost as many ethnicities and walks of life as there are patrons.

Live entertainment. Live music and belly dancing are offered on Friday and Saturday night, but the best show is the spontaneous conversation that seems to spread from table to table like wildfire.

Star gazing. Toronto's original late-night spot, Christina's is still open until 4 or 5 a.m. on busy nights, and many entertainment celebrities gravitate to it. Recent sightings include Kristey Alley, Tony Danza, and Alicia Silverstone of "Batgirl" fame. Those who prefer gazing at the "Big Dipper" will find that Christina's patio, while not the largest on the Danforth, is certainly the most popular; come early if you want to grab a strategic spot.

A Danforth institution most definitely run by the inmates, Christina's is a crazy, wonderful place; until you've done it, you haven't really done the Danforth.

CIBC makes difference in community

As Community Manager for the Danforth, Dave D'Amico has a twofold responsibility: one, to ensure a high quality of service within his member branches; and two, to promote goodwill and improve the quality of life in the surrounding community.

Dave D'Amico
CIBC Danforth Community Manager
421-0051

Not unique to the Danforth, this approach is part of a company-wide commitment to providing help where help is needed. Underscoring this fact, in '98/99 the CIBC donated some $26 million to a wide variety of charities and causes, including the Baycrest Centre, Mount Sinai Hospital, Riverdale Hospital, Toronto East General Hospital, several schools, and countless community projects.

D'Amico favours a hands-on approach that sees him personally participating in fund-raising and other charitable events. He also takes pleasure in encouraging employees, associates and friends to do likewise.

D'Amico brings to the table an extensive background in both banking and volunteer work. And as someone who has lived and worked on the Danforth for a number of years, he is well-positioned to turn CIBC's strong presence in the area (eight branches) to good account.

Building goodwill starts within each branch, he says. "We want every single visit to be a happy one for our customers. This is a standard we strive to uphold each and every day." Good works outside the branch are a natural extension of this philosophy, he says. "We want people to think of the CIBC not only as a great place to bank, but as a good neighbour."

D'Amico's approachability, easygoing manner and work ethic have endeared him to Danforth business people and members of the general community, and he relishes the opportunity to serve. The sense that he is helping to make a difference gives him "all the gratification I need. Giving back to the community isn't something that's nice to do, it's something we have to do."

D'Amico can be reached directly at (416) 421-0051, or through e-mail at ddamico@ibm.net.

Sun Valley takes quality, freshness, gourmet selection to new level

Think you're good at spotting imperfections in fruit and vegetables? Think again. At Sun Valley Fine Foods, you may need a magnifying glass.

Upholding a family tradition begun by his father, Spiro Aravantinos and partner Peter Vacirtzoglou have elevated fine food purveyance to an art form. Rising at the crack of dawn to hand-pick the cream of the fruit and vegetable crop, the partners then race across town to 583 Danforth Avenue and stack it in row on bountiful row so gleaming and seamless you almost feel guilty picking it up. The produce at this emporium of fine food comes as close to perfection as you'll ever find. Fresh herbs are flown in weekly from Israel.

Sun Valley brims with culinary delights in every nook and cranny. You'll find breads from Ace Bakery, Future Bakery and Fred's Breads, among others; a dozen flavours of pita from Pita Break; gourmet crackers galore; and the finest jams money can buy, including Greaves from Niagara-On-The-Lake. Sushi from Kama Sushi, Caviar from The Caviar House — you name it, it's here.

Sun Valley's "designer collection" of fine spreadables, sauces and dressings includes a host of famous labels. From the U.K., there's Cross & Blackwell, Gordon's, Patak's, and Sharwood's; from France, Maille and St-Dalfour; from the U.S., Paula's, Jacques Pépin's, and Olde Cape Cod; and others from around the world. Sun Valley also offers its own house brand of jams, sauces and dressings bottled for it by an award-winning Canadian supplier. Olive oil? Exotic brands too numerous to mention, including one exclusive to Sun Valley that was ranked #1 among all oils tested in a recent Toronto Star poll.

Sun Valley's growing selection of Kosher products will be expanded even further in the near future.

Party trays a hit

If you're entertaining but don't feel like cooking, the party trays for which Sun Valley is famous are a phone call away. If you're visiting relatives or friends, you can choose from Toronto's finest selection of gourmet gift baskets.

Responding to changing demographics in the Danforth area, Sun Valley underwent major renovations in 1993. The glittering result — immaculate inside and out — has succeeded in catering to a growing yuppie class with international tastes while retaining its loyal Greek following.

One extremely pleasant surprise at Sun Valley is price. You'd expect to pay a premium for the exquisite quality they offer, but you don't. "Value is part of our tradition," says Spiro. "We cannot and will not overcharge."

At the centre of the store is a pentagonal meat and deli counter featuring cheese from around the world (including some eight varieties of feta), prime quality meat and poultry, and the plumpest, juiciest olives this side of heaven. Sun Valley's hand-cut shish kebabs are in such demand that a full-time butcher was added to the in-house staff for the sole purpose of cutting shish kebabs. Distinctively superior to the cookie-cutter variety you'll find in many supermarkets, they are typical of Sun Valley's obsession with quality, and, as an in-store sign proudly proclaims, contain NO MSG. WE NEVER USE IT AND WE NEVER WILL.

MSG-free shish kebabs hand-cut

If you're a nosher, an embarrassment of riches awaits you. Cakes and pastries from Dufflet, La Rocca and Pauline's are supplemented by Sun Valley's own cookies, croissants and banana breads baked fresh daily in store. Confections include Valrhona chocolates from France. Coffee from A.L. Van Houtte, considered by many connoisseurs to be the finest available today, is offered in some 15 delicious blends.

Spiro and Peter thrive on the long hours that are part and parcel of the food business. "It's a labour of love," says Spiro — and one that's rewarded daily. "When customers take our food home, in a sense they're taking us home," he smiles.

A fascinating documentary on Jewish intellectuals out on video

By LARRY ANKLEWICZ
Special to The CJN

A unique and interesting view of the Jewish world is provided by three recent video releases.

Shown recently at a screening held by the Jewish Film Society in Toronto, Arguing The World is a fascinating documentary that focuses on four Jewish intellectuals, each of whom was caught up in the political and social conflicts of their times.

Irving Howe, Daniel Bell, Nathan Glazer and Irving Kristol were all New York Jews who grew up during the turbulent political times of the 1930s and 1940s. They all experienced similar idealistic periods during their college days. Each one participated and survived the passionate days of the McCarthy era, only to meet new challenges. In their later days they often changed their political positions.

This is an absorbing look at the backgrounds of these philosophical crusaders and portrays how each one met the challenge of changing political winds including their battle with the new left in the '60s and their political views today.

The video is available through CHV in Canada.

Madam Rosa is the classic Moshe Mizrahi film featuring Simone Signoret as a retired madam who earns her living by caring for the children of her fellow prostitutes.

This 1977 French film won an Academy Award as Best Foreign Film and is now being made available on video for the first time in Canada by CHV.

The story in Madame Rosa revolves around the Jewish madam, a survivor of Auschwitz, and her growing relationship with a young Algerian boy. It is considered a masterpiece of French cinema.

The third video is called Lies & Whispers in North America, although it was filmed in Europe under the title Prague Pair. This co-production between American and European film companies is essentially a romantic thriller.

The action gets under way when Dr. Lauren Graham (Gina Gershon) attends a medical convention in Prague. She meets and falls in love with Jiri (Rade Serbedzija), a Czech dissident writer who is now being considered for the position of minister of culture in the Czech Republic.

Everything seems to be going smoothly. Lauren mentions that her

SUMMER LITERARY ISSUE PART II

The Wisdom of Solomon: Toronto Life had less than great expectations last winter when it published a short but blistering diatribe about newscaster Evan Solomon's not-yet-published first novel, Crossing the Distance.

The manuscript needed massive editorial work, sneered the magazine, and its intended publisher, McClelland & Stewart (M&S), had taken it on merely because of its author's high media profile. Not so, responded M&S senior fiction editor Ellen Seligman in a curt reply, asserting that the manuscript was first-rate.

Now in print, Crossing the Distance seems an ambitious first novel that demonstrates adroitness, even cleverness. Solomon, who has hosted two CBC Newsworld television programs and co-founded the magazine Shift, has followed the writerly maxim of sticking to what he knows: the fickle, shallow, image-obsessed universe of television and the mass media.

In Crossing the Distance, TV newscaster Jake Jacobson is the prime suspect in a murder of the sort he has covered endlessly on air – only this time, the victim is his girlfriend. Despite his innocence, he takes to the lam, eventually communing with his brother, an outlaw environmental activist.

My verdict: the book seems competently written, but its characters lack depth. To some degree, Solomon's wildly satirical and cynical take on the excesses of television parrots TV's own habit of delivering talking heads. All in all, not a memorable read.

Waxman Waxes Eloquent: Toronto actor/director Al Waxman has written an autobiography chronicling his career in television, radio, movies and stage.

The former King of Kensington received an Order of Canada two years ago, and won favorable reviews last year for his portrayal at Stratford of Willy Loman in Death of a Salesman.

Next year he intends to direct The Diary of Anne Frank at Stratford, clear signs that he's at the top of his career as both an actor and director.

Malcolm Lester Books is bringing out the Waxman opus in October under the title That's What I Am.

The Toronto-based publishing house, meanwhile, has pushed back the February 2000 publication date of another title, Our People: Canadian Jewish Life Today, by Morton Weinfeld, a sociology professor at McGill University. Production has been delayed for unspecified reasons.

Poetic Trio: Mosaic Press of Oakville has recently brought out three new books of poetry by Simcha Simchovich, Seymour Mayne and Morris Granatstein. The books, bound in pleasing formats with attractive covers, share the qualities of being accessible, slim, thoughtful, and concerned with Jewish subjects and issues.

In Welcome to the Year 2000, the Lodz-born Granatstein looks back on nine decades in the old country and "Kanada." In the long poem Zyshe der Zhytomirer, the title character, who attempts suicide, tells his story to a friend from the confines of the Queen Street Mental Health Centre, and is eventually deported.

Mayne's Carbon Filter consists of a series of about 40 mostly light and amusing poems, most addressed to or dedicated in memory of specific persons, including several Canadian Jewish writers: Leonard Cohen, Shel Krakofsky, Irving Layton, Kenneth Sherman, Adele Wiseman.

In The Remnant, Simchovich resumes his monumental literary task of bearing personal and poetic witness to this century's most grim historical episode. He also focuses on matters of Yiddish cultural life, both in his native Poland and his adopted homeland of Canada. He offers odes to Sholom Asch, Morris Rosenfeld, Michelangelo, Van Gogh and other figures.

Simchovich's allusions to biblical stories seem particularly expressive, as when he recalls how King David was also "hunted, exiled by his numerous adversaries." The narrator of the poem Book of Psalms finds himself murmuring these words into the psalmbook:

"Like you, King David, I am afflicted / and crowned with the thorns of suffering. / Like you I wander over lands and cities, / fleeing from the rage of evildoers / who cut off my stem and branches / with not one thought of mercy or regret."

The books deserve a wide readership.

Unique view of Jewish world on new videos grandfather was part Jewish and Jiri informs her that his family is Jewish.

When Lauren attends a birthday party for Jiri's father, she shows him a photo of her recently departed grandfather. Jiri's father immediately recognizes the man as a Czech collaborator who was a camp commander during the war and was instrumental in arresting Jiri's father and sisters and killing the sisters.

This information devastates Lauren. She pursues an investigation of the matter and is able to confirm the information. The question then becomes how can these two people continue their relationship under these circumstances.

The real question is whether a child of a war criminal is in any way responsible for a father's or grandfather's crimes. Even if the child is not responsible, isn't there a considerable amount of friction and guilt created by the knowledge that one person's family persecuted the other's family.

Lies & Whispers is distributed by Sullivan Entertainment. Video retailers can obtain copies through their distributors or they can obtain the first two videos directly from CHV.

For those interested, Life Is Beautiful is now available on video.

Glick choral highlights TCC performance

By ANNA TURKIENICZ
CJN Staff

TORONTO — The Toronto Children's Chorus (TCC), wearing red polo shirts with blue sweatshirts tied around their waists, recently left for Australia to perform in the Sydney Sings Festival.

Srul Irving Glick's composition, Psalm Trilogy, a 20-minute choral cycle consisting of Psalms 92, 47 and 23, is a highlight of the repertoire. The trilogy is sung in English and Hebrew.

"What an incredible thrill," said Glick, composer-in-residence at Beth Tikvah Synagogue, "to have Jean Bartle conduct the Psalm Trilogy with the Toronto Children's Chorus and 900 other children at the Sydney Opera House.

"When I attended a rehearsal in Toronto, I heard the children sing," Glick said. "They sing like angels; their sound is magnificent."

Ruth Schwebel, whose son Aaron, 11, is one of the youngest participants in the tour choir, said that "being able to sing Glick's Psalms has given my son a unique opportunity to take pride in his Jewish and Canadian heritage."

The trilogy was presented by 1,000 voices from around the world – accompanied by strings from the Sydney Symphony Orchestra, and conducted by Jean Ashworth Bartle – in a world premiere at the Opera House on July 14.

Bartle, the TCC musical director, founded the choir in 1978 when Andrew Davis, then conductor of the Toronto Symphony Orchestra, asked her to provide a children's chorus to perform with the orchestra.

Since then, Bartle has striven to provide a unique musical and educational opportunity for children. The TCC offers young children from a broad cross-section of socio-economic and cultural backgrounds, the opportunity to rehearse and perform with exceptional artists and composers.

Members of the Toronto Children's Chorus rehearse.

Choristers are accepted by audition and then placed, according to ability, in a choir level best suited for them.

The children are then given rehearsal and performance schedules which become more demanding as they progress into more select levels. The tour choir, one of the most demanding groups, is made up of children, ages 11 to 18, of varying backgrounds.

Bartle has tried to support Canadian composers and artists by featuring Canadian works wherever the choir performs. Their current touring repertoire will feature compositions by 17 Canadian composers.

"This tour has been three years in the planning," says Bartle, "and to see it unfold day by day is the realization of a dream."

After officially opening the festival, the choir will serve as the Canadian representative and artist-in-residence for the duration of their stay in Sydney.

The choir will then spend almost three more weeks travelling through Australia and New Zealand as they perform in concerts and workshops for international educators, directors, choirs and audiences. As they travel, Bartle will headline a series of workshops and masterclasses on Canadian music.

"This is a wonderful experience for the children in so many different ways," said Bartle. "Not only do they learn about the countries they are visiting, but the tour provides them with a renewed appreciation for the choral art.

"The group that is travelling is a highly select musical group – a magnificent instrument," said Bartle. "It will be a wonderful experience for them to see how much audiences from all over the world appreciate and enjoy them."

The Psalm Trilogy will have its North American permiere in a concert entitled Roots and Wings on November 14 at Beth Tikvah Synagogue.

Warmth of Sicilians will leave you smiling

By GERRY SCHWARTZ
Special to The CJN

SICILY — Springtime in Sicily – not a book title, but a delightful time of year for a destination that abounds in varied natural beauty, many archeological sites and a fascinating history, which once included a sizeable Jewish community.

This second largest island in the Mediterranean has exuberant, warm local people who offer natural food based on fresh produce and local wine.

Sicily has three coastlines, and each of its four principal cities – Catania, Agrigento, Trapani and Palermo – has its own ambience. From Rome, it's a short connecting flight via Alitalia to either Catania or Palermo. If you wish to do a full counter-clockwise tour of Sicily's perimeter, start in Catania, in the shadow of Mt. Etna – the only active volcano in Europe – which was both snow-covered and steaming in April.

From Catania, you can take a small train that circumnavigates Etna, and get off at small villages around the base of this wonder of nature. On the Ionian coast not far from Catania are the seaside and cliffside towns of Acicastello, Acireale and Taromina (north) and the city of Siracusa (south) with its Greek amphitheatre and "Ear of Dionysius" to test your hearing acuity.

The medieval quarter on the island of Ortyga, was once famous for its Jewish doctors and had the second largest Jewish population in Sicily after Palermo before the Spanish expulsion. Four streets encompass the former Giudecci quarter, one among 52 communities of Jews in Sicily at the end of the 15th century.

While the vast interior of Sicily is mountainous, even small towns are accessible by bus from the nearest coastal towns and some are well worth a detour for their architecture, history and peacefulness. One such small place is Noto, with its Baroque architecture; it is an hour by bus from Syracuse.

A long but worthwhile train ride from Catania will bring you to the city of Agrigento on the Mediterranean Sea sitting on a cliff overlooking the Valle dei Templi, an amazingly intact series of ancient Greek structures and columns as well as a Roman cardo from the fifth to the sixth centuries.

Leaving by bus at 6:30 a.m. and seeing the temples floodlit in the early morning light was a breathtaking experience. The coastal area around Agrigento is literally covered with vineyards, almond and olive trees, and orange and lemon orchards.

Continuing around to the southwestern coast past the ruins of Salunite, the town of Marsala and the Greek ruins of Segesta, you arrive at the port town of Trapani facing Tunisia, with its scenic old fishing port and modern ferry terminal to the Egadi Islands offshore.

The atmosphere here is more sub-tropical and Arab-influenced and here, too, there is an ancient Jewish quarter. The beautiful medieval village of Erice sits in the clouds above Trapani and its narrow cobblestoned alleys and brooding foggy air reminded me of Safed in Israel. In the small Cordici museum is a stone slab with Hebrew names.

The coast between Trapani and the capital, Palermo, offers many beautiful small villages with great sea views – very quiet out of season – such as Scopello and Capo San Vito. Palermo, a city of close to one million was a very pleasant surprise and well worth a few days for its museums, sophisticated opera house and theatres, ancient monuments and lively street markets.

The Discessa dei Guidecci off the corso Vittorio Emmanuele once held a thriving Jewish community, where one large square – now abandoned – in particular reminded me of the ghetto area in Venice. The hillside towns of Montrealé and Corléone sit above the capital and are accessible by bus.

Heading east of Palermo, you pass Cefalú and surrounding villages where the film Cinéma Paradiso was shot, and in a short while you reach Milazzo, the boat dock for the seven Aeoli Islands, of which Lipari is the largest and Vulcano the closest and very scenic and friendly – a perfect rest stop in your Sicilian journey.

Passing through the city of Messina, where it is a short jaunt across the strait to the Italian mainland in Calabria, you can view the peak of Mt. Etna once more before returning to Catania, where you can do another day trip to the beautiful towns of Enna and Piazza Armerina by bus.

If one has a few days to spare, a side-trip to the nearby island of Malta is interesting. There are flights from both Palermo and Catania and ferries and hydrofoils from three ports in season. Malta has a strong Arabic influence but is also noted for its British traditions and atmosphere as well as its historic castles. Malta has a very small Jewish community and synagogue.

Though Sicily may not have the art treasures and museums of the north of Italy, the sheer warmth and joy of living of the Sicilani will leave you smiling. Flying over the crater of Mt. Etna on the return Catania-Rome flight inspired a feeling that I wanted to return: A la prossima volta/Until the next time.

As a final bit of trivia: Catania has a link to Israel's War of Independence. In 1947-48, during the dying months of the British Mandate in Palestine, the Catania airfield was used as a refuelling stop and way station for the ferrying of arms from Prague, Czechoslovakia, to Tel Aviv to prepare the Haganah for the struggle to come in the birth of the State of Israel.

TAU devises new laser tool to replace surgical stitching

By TAMARA TRAUBMAN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

TEL AVIV — Researchers at Tel Aviv University have developed a new laser system for bonding tissues to replace the old methods using blades and stitches.

The laser procedure, which has been tested successfully on animals and is now ready for application on human patients, has many advantages over the older methods. A laser is non-invasive, cannot infect tissue the way staples or stitches can, and is easy to use.

Dr. Eyal Strassmann and Dr. Nino Loya of the ophthalmology department at Beilinson Medical Centre in Petah Tikvah, where the laser was tested on animals' eyes, said the laser system was quicker and easier to use.

"Stitching, especially in delicate surgery, requires great dexterity on the part of the surgeon and years of practice," said Strassmann. "Even on tissues that need to be sealed immediately, such as blood vessels or eyes, the laser is preferable because its seal is perfectly hermetic, while stitching leaves open spaces," he said.

Scientists and researchers worldwide have long pursued the goal of a laser-based bonding system but were stymied by how to regulate the temperature of the beam. A beam that is too hot will burn, while one that is too cold will simply be ineffective.

Tel Aviv University researchers from the branch for applied physics solved the problem by designing a system that would set the heat of the laser to suit the normal heat of the tissue. The researchers, headed by Dr. Avraham Katzir, developed a special fibre-optic sensor that can read the infrared-radiation emitted by the body's tissues and deliver information about the temperature to the computer that controls the laser beam.

Researchers conducted additional experiments on moles' bladders, achieving a 94 percent success rate in bonding the tissue with the laser.

Bladders that were closed with ordinary, traditional stitching methods remained open 24 hours later and when they did close there was still inflammation around the wounds. Laser-treated bladders, however, were sealed shut, with almost no sign they had ever been cut open and no inflammation at all.

"Bonding, using the new laser system, will allow doctors to fasten tissues together without leaving any scars," said Katzir. "Additionally, the laser is non-invasive, allowing surgical operations in certain tissues that would not have been possible with stitches. These possibilities will bring about a revolution in surgery.

About Nutrition

Q. I have been told that my triglycerides are elevated. What should I do?

A. Elevated triglycerides, a component of most people's cholesterol profile, requires special dietary intervention. The necessary changes to reduce high triglycerides are a reduction in sugars and alcohols, as well as exercise and weight management.

Q. I often enjoy stopping off at one of the many coffee shops and having a specialty coffee, such as a flavored cappuccino. I am wondering how high in fat and calories these are.

A. The fat and calorie content of these specialty drinks vary greatly. Depending on the size, many of the drinks, both hot and cold, can contain as many as 300 calories and 10 grams of fat. Here are some tips: Order drinks with skim, one percent or two percent milk instead of homo, drink the smaller size servings and ask for nutrition information. I have found that most specialty coffee shops have the information in the store to show you.

Aboriginal skin remedy approved

Mahonia Aquifolium

TORONTO — A remedy used by native Indians to treat skin diseases has proven to be an effective way to relieve the symptoms of psoriasis, eczema and other dry skin conditions.

Health Canada has granted a drug approval to a Canadian manufacturer for Mahonia Aquifolium under DIN 02230462.

The remedy is derived from the Mahonia Aquifolium, also known as the Oregon grape, a two-metre-high bush with yellow buds that grows in the forests on the west coast of North America.

Known for centuries to native peoples, the Mahonia Aquifolium, is a powerful herb whose root and bark yield alkaloids that can be used to treat eczema, dermatitis, dandruff and other skin conditions.

Mahonia Aquifolium is a gentle yet very effective treatment without any of the side effects of steroids or harsh chemicals. Researchers have learned that these alkaloids are strong anti-bacterial and anti-fungal agents that inhibit abnormal skin growth.

Where the average person's skin cells renew themselves once every 28 days, the skin of a person affected by psoriasis renews itself once every three or four days. This results in an unsightly, painful and incurable condition, which has been treated with ultraviolet light, lotions and creams which are derived from tar or contain steroids.

Long-term use of these treatments has been known to produce side effects that may include advanced osteoporosis, high blood pressure, liver and kidney abnormalities, hair loss, severe gingivitis necessitating tooth extraction or fetal malformation.

No side effects from Mahonia Aquifolium have been observed in clinical testing in both Europe and North America. In a German clinical study conducted on 433 men and women with psoriasis, researchers applied a cream containing Mahonia Aquifolium to the test subjects' affected skin areas, and of those tested, 81 percent said their symptoms disappeared or were substantially alleviated within 12 weeks.

$100 MILLION BEST MEDICINE CAMPAIGN

Lawrence Bloomberg, First Marathon and several of its executives recently donated $5 million to Mount Sinai Hospital's The Best Medicine campaign, of which Bloomberg is chair, raising the campaign over its initial milestone of $100 million, an amount unprecedented in Canadian health care. The hospital has directed the gift toward the expansion of obstetric and newborn care. In recognition of Bloomberg's leadership as chair of the campaign, the department of obstetrics and gynecology at Mount Sinai is being renamed The Frances and Lawrence Bloomberg Department of Obstetrics and Gynecology. Shown from left are Bloomberg, Premier Mike Harris and Bloomberg's wife Frances.

Broke 99 boards in one minute

Connecticut man sets world karate record

By DAVID BILMES
The Connecticut Jewish Ledger

WEST HARTFORD, Conn. — Scott Cohen is soft spoken and an unimposing 5-foot-6, 150 lbs. But put a stack of wooden boards in front of him – and watch out!

Cohen set a world record recently when he used his hands to break 99 boards of wood in one minute.

Cohen's karate mentor, Paul Arel of South Windsor, Conn., who is also Jewish, had set the previous record of 93 in 1976. Arel was by Cohen's side when Cohen set the record during the International Kokondo Association's annual awards banquet in Windsor Locks. Each board was a foot long and three-quarters of an inch thick.

Cohen, 26, attended Congregation B'nai Sholom while growing up in Newington, Conn. He attended school in West Hartford, and is now vice-president in charge of marketing and administration at his family's Newington shoe store, Footprints.

The West Hartford resident, who began karate lessons when he was five, holds a third degree black belt in jukido ju-jitsu and a second degree black belt in kokondo karate.

Cohen's office is adorned with photos of sports stars, including one of Cohen flying through the air in a martial arts maneuver.

Q. Did your hands hurt after you broke the record?
A. Not at all. It only hurts when the boards don't break.

Q. Why smash wooden boards?
A. The style that I do is kokondo, which is primarily Japanese, with some other Asian differences. Kokondo is a self-defence art that was developed by Paul Arel, who is world-renowned. He's a martial arts pioneer, the first non-Japanese to teach martial arts in Connecticut. When my father (David) saw he was teaching a local class, he got my brother and me involved.

Board-breaking and object breaking is a very minor facet of our training. The breaking is done because our number one emphasis is safety. We simulate making contact. We don't actually connect with our partner. When you want to test the technique, feel the impact, and feel the damage the part of your body that you're using is capable of doing, then you go to an inanimate object like a board or a brick.

Q. Will you try to break your own record?
A. I've submitted the achievement, with documentation, to Guinness. Not only to the Guinness Book of World Records, but to the television show, Guinness Prime. If they'd like to have me on the show, then I will try to break my own record live. Beyond that, I'm very comfortable with the 99. I don't have anything to prove to myself or anybody else. I have no need to attempt it again.

Q. Are many Jews involved in martial arts?
A. It's a coincidence that my instructor and I both happen to be Jewish. There are actually a high number of Jews involved in our system because my brother (Daniel) has been teaching one of the more successful classes in our international system for over 10 years at Brandeis University. I've had a few Jewish students and there are a few other Jewish people involved. We have classes in our system that have been taught at synagogues. I might set up a class at the Hartford Jewish Community Centre. (Canada's three-time, middleweight ju-jitsu champion is Joel Gerson of Toronto.)

Q. How much training do you do?
A. I practice about five days a week and I'm a student in classes one or two times a month.

Q. How do your parents feel about your karate success?
A. They're totally supportive. My father was actually my first registered student. He started with me about 10 years ago. My mother Jerilyn, has participated in my women's self-defence classes. So, both of my parents have actually been students of mine at one time or another.

The Inside Back

ספרותנו

חוש העסקים שלי מאת: נורית זרחי, הוצאת הקיבוץ המאוחד

בכל ארועי העלילה, חושפת הסופרת בעיות כלכליות-חברתיות קשות ("אבא יושב בבית כל היום וקורא עתונים מבלי להדליק את האור") אך אינה גורעת מנימת התמימות והקסם הילדותי באווירת הסיפור.

About Food

Turn off the stove, turn up the air conditioning, find a fan. It's that time of year when easy meals are the order of the day. Eating out is great, but it gets costly.

Local produce is plentiful, fresh vegetables are perfect fare. Backyard barbecues are going strong. The man of the house is busy at the grill, but he's complaining because the surrounding air feels like an oven!

Summertime is brief, so relax, stay cool and take any shortcuts you can. Here are some simple suggestions to beat the heat:

•Spicy foods are super — they make you perspire and cool down.

•Most chilled foods are at their best when served almost at room temperature. Over-season foods slightly, as many flavors are more subtle when foods are chilled.

•Prepare salad greens in advance: wash and dry thoroughly. Refrigerate in a plastic bag with paper towels to absorb excess moisture. They'll keep for two or three days.

•Get together with friends and share the cooking. Make extra to freeze for another day.

•Cook a big batch of pasta. Serve some hot with your favorite sauce and use the rest in a cold pasta salad. You could also freeze pasta in air-tight baggies. When needed, remove from bag, place in a strainer and rinse with boiling water, or reheat in the microwave, allowing one minute on high per cup of pasta.

QUICK COUSCOUS SALAD

2 cups couscous
4 cups water, chicken or vegetable broth
2 cloves garlic, minced
1 red and 1 yellow pepper, chopped
2 carrots, grated
6 green onions, chopped
1/4 cup minced parsley
2 tbsp. extra-virgin oil
3 tbsp. lemon juice
Salt and pepper, to taste
1/2 tsp, each chili powder, dry mustard and cumin

Combine couscous and water or broth. Let stand for 10 minutes to absorb liquid. Add remaining ingredients; mix well. Season to taste. Cover and refrigerate.

Yield: 8 servings. Keeps in refrigerator up to three days, tightly covered.

The case of the Levy fortune

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Iraqi Jews from as far away as Tel Aviv and from as close as Toronto have launched an international effort to prove they are the rightful heirs to a fabulous fortune amassed by two brothers from Baghdad in the 19th century.

The intriguing case has been coursing through British courts for years now.

And, in an amazing twist, the possibility has been raised that a Levy descendant is now a full-fledged member of Britain's royal family.

The case involves about 1,600 families, predominantly from Israel but also from countries such as Canada, Britain and Holland.

Intrigue at the heart of Iraqi Jewish story

In Canada, at least two Sephardi families, the Levys and the Fattals, are linked to Elazar and Shimon Levy.

Aboud Sasson, a Tel Aviv insurance agent who represents the Israeli claimants through an organization known as the Agga Levy Society, is confident of ultimate success.

"Otherwise," he declared in an interview in his office, "I would not have worked on this case. We must be optimistic."

Not everyone is as sanguine.

"I'm skeptical that it can be resolved," said Ofer Shahal, the son of Moshe Shahal, a prominent Tel Aviv lawyer and former Israeli cabinet minister whose law firm is at the forefront of investigating the claims.

Regardless of the outcome, this murky, somewhat convoluted case inspires heady metaphors.

"It sounds like a legend taken from One Thousand and One Arabian Nights," said Avner Meiri, a Toronto man born in Iraq.

James Becker, an Israeli scientist and a descendant of the fabled Iraqi brothers, likens it to "a very exciting, unusual and incredible detective story."

Levitts case sent to beit din

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Ontario Superior Court of Justice has granted a stay of proceedings in the case launched by Montreal-based Levitts Kosher Foods Inc. against three Toronto rabbis.

"It would be inappropriate for the court in this case to interfere with the authority of the rabbis," wrote Madam Justice Mary Lou Benotto in her 11-page ruling last week.

In effect, the court is turning the case over to a beit din (rabbinical court), as the defendants prefer. The rabbis had already attempted to summon Levitts to a beit din.

Morton Katz, co-owner of Levitts, said the company did not "ignore" the beit din summons, even though the ruling indicated otherwise.

Capital Demographics

JERUSALEM — Jews make up two-thirds of Jerusalem's 633,000 residents, according to a study released last month. The city's Jewish population grew by one percent last year, compared to a more than three percent growth rate among the city's Arab residents. Mayor Ehud Olmert called for an increase in affordable housing to attract young Jewish couples to the capital.

Task Force On Violence

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Ehud Barak appointed a special ministerial committee to combat domestic violence. Barak's move followed the arrest of a Tel Aviv man who confessed to murdering and torching his wife and two small children because he suspected his spouse was flirting over the Internet.

Art Claim Probed

JERUSALEM — The Israel Museum is investigating claims that it has been displaying a painting looted by the Nazis. James Snyder, the museum's director, said his institution learned about Camille Pissarro's Boulevard Montmartre, Spring 1897 after receiving a letter from an attorney representing the family of Max Silberberg, a Jewish businessman and art collector who died in the Holocaust.

Synagogues In Airplanes

JERUSALEM — Airbus is willing to outfit five of its A340 aircraft with small synagogues in hopes of enticing El Al to purchase the planes. A spokesperson for the European aircraft manufacturer said the synagogues, which could accommodate 12 worshippers, would be located on the lower deck of the plane and would include an ark mounted on a movable track so that it always faces Jerusalem.

JFK Jr. Memorialized

JERUSALEM — The Jewish National Fund is establishing a memorial forest in Israel to commemorate John F. Kennedy Jr., his wife and sister-in-law, who were killed in a plane crash last month. The move comes more than 30 years after JNF set up a forest in memory of President John F. Kennedy.

'Acts of Terror'

MOSCOW — Police evacuated a Moscow synagogue late last month after an anonymous caller phoned in a bomb threat. No explosives were found at the Lubavitch-run Bolshaya Bronnaya shul, where a powerful bomb was found and safely detonated the previous Sunday.

The earlier incident, and the July 13 stabbing of a Jewish leader in the Russian capital, are "anti-Semitic acts of terror," said Moscow Mayor Uri Luzhkov. The city's Jewish leaders had criticized federal and city officials for their silence after the stabbing attack.

Germany Ups Funds

BERLIN — Germany has approved increased funding during the next four years for the preservation of concentration camp memorials and Holocaust research centres around the country. The funding will rise from $16 million next year to $27 million by 2003, according to Culture Minister Michael Naumann.

Fund to Pay Victims

MOSCOW — Payments totalling $1.05 million are scheduled to be made this week to Russian Holocaust survivors. A total of 1,745 Jewish survivors and 890 non-Jewish survivors will each receive $400 from a $180 million fund established in 1997 by Swiss banks.

Clark's Embassy Move Was Debacle: Documents

OTTAWA — Joe Clark's ill-fated attempt in 1979 to move Canada's embassy to Jerusalem landed him in hot water almost as soon the announcement was made, newly released documents show.

The Canadian Press reported last week that documents released under the Access to Information Act show Clark instructed his ministers to downplay the move after Bell Canada registered objections.

The company was apparently concerned about losing a large telecommunications contract in Saudi Arabia.

The documents show Clark asked his inner cabinet ministers to "keep their heads down" on the issue, "as it was important not to exacerbate the situation."

Three weeks after he was elected prime minister in May 1979, Clark announced he would keep an election promise and transfer Canada's embassy from Tel Aviv to Jerusalem. That set off angry protests from Arab countries.

In late June, he announced a one-year delay while former Tory leader Robert Stanfield conducted a fact-finding mission.

The move was scrapped entirely in October 1979 after Stanfield advised against it, according to CP.

Jews welcome decision to cease Lord's Prayer

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Despite a small spike in anti-Semitic telephone calls – and the belief by some members of the local Jewish community that waves should not have been made – the recent decision to ban the Lord's Prayer in classrooms has been welcomed in Saskatoon.

The ruling by the Saskatchewan Human Rights Commission, handed down July 23, orders Saskatoon's public school board to stop the practice of reciting the Lord's Prayer in classrooms.

The decision came after four days of emotional testimony last month, in which the parents who launched the complaint and expert witnesses testified the prayer is discriminatory and can be psychologically damaging for non-Christians (CJN, July 29).

Ken Halvorson, the retired judge who headed the commission, found that the daily recitation of the prayer, despite a provision allowing children to leave the classroom, stay silent or recite a prayer of their own, denies schoolchildren their religious freedom.

Reciting the Lord's Prayer has been left up to the discretion of individual teachers and principals. It had been recited in only about one-fifth of Saskatoon's public classrooms.

The decision says the evidence demonstrated "the evils of allowing individual teachers to decide whether the Lord's Prayer will be said. Whim can play a role; so can personal bias, even from well-meaning persons. Decision on prayers is too important to allow elected boards to delegate responsibility to unelected staff."

He slams the board's use of "weasel words" in delegating authority to teachers.

Halvorson suggests the board drop all prayer and "shed its image as a backwater of religious intolerance."

Complaints of discrimination were "substantiated far beyond the required burden of balance of probabilities."

The ruling is binding, despite the fact it did not come from a court. The school board has 30 days to launch an appeal.

"We're very pleased," Rosanna Langer, one of the Jewish parents who launched the complaint, told The CJN in a telephone interview. "It's a very thorough decision."

'A complete victory'

Langer, whose daughter Emma, 11, told the commission she felt "looked down on" for not taking part in the Lord's Prayer, said that at least two of the board's nine trustees have expressed support for suspending the prayer.

Rabbi Steven Kaplan, spiritual leader of Congregation Agudas Israel, said several anti-Semitic messages were left on the synagogue's answering machine, at least one of them telling Jews "to go back where they came from."

The ruling is "wise... it was the only decision to come to if they were going to show any sensitivity," Rabbi Kaplan said.

The 33-page decision also notes that Larry Haiven, the other Jewish parent (one of nine who began the complaint in 1993), received "nasty" telephone calls and "has suffered emotionally."

Grant Scharfstein, president of Agudas Israel, which had intervenor status in the case, said he too was pleased with the ruling. "But it's unfortunate it took this long."

He said he received several calls from fellow congregants who felt the city's Jewish community should not have been so visible in the case.

"But it's important to stand up and be counted," he said, adding that the Jewish community has been trying to get rid of the Lord's Prayer in classrooms since 1953.

Rabbi Roger Pavey, the retired spiritual leader of the 150-family member synagogue, also said he received two or three anti-Semitic calls at home. "But at this point, we really don't care."

He said he it's not clear what the board will do. There is talk of dropping the prayer when classes resume next month, or of substituting "a cocktail of prayers, which we would not support."

Karen Mock, an educational psychologist and director of B'nai Brith Canada's League for Human Rights, called the ruling "a complete victory."

Mock, who testified as an expert witness, told the commission that forcing children to recite the prayer, or allowing them to opt out, can be psychologically harmful for non-Christians because it can make them feel inferior and interfere with the development of their sense of self.

Canadian Jewish Congress said it was "heartened" by the ruling.

In a statement, CJC spokesperson Mark Weintraub said he hopes the decision, "supported by provincial courts across the country and the Supreme Court of Canada, will now firmly set an ethical compass for Canadian public schools."

Moving, audacious thinker

The literary culture of the Jewish people is a constantly regenerating, constantly reinvigorating vein of deep intellectual and literary wealth.

In every generation, in every century and in every field of human intellectual exploration since the oral law was codified, the deeply driving curiosity and imagination of the Jewish soul have expressed ideas and communicated concepts of profound, long-lasting significance.

Throughout the ages, Jewish writers and thinkers have stocked, and continue to stock, for the benefit of all mankind, a "library" where fingertips tingle at the touch of the spines of the works. And the inquiring heart can have no surfeit of satiation.

There is, simply, a vast ocean of scholarship, literature and writing. Most of us, however, dip our hands only into the shallows along the shore. We seldom reach towards the deeper parts, thus leaving unseen, so much beauty and unawares, so much knowledge.

One of this century's most moving writers and most audacious religious thinkers was Abraham Joshua Heschel. Among his many important works are: Man Is Not Alone, God in Search of Man, A Passion for Truth, Israel: An Echo of Eternity, Who is Man? and The Prophets.

Heschel was also one of this century's most audacious social activists. Indeed, one of the most famous photographs of the mid-'60s' struggle for civil rights in the United States, is that of Heschel walking alongside Martin Luther King on the segregated streets of Selma, Ala. Their arms are intertwined in common cause and friendship as they march resolutely together into the face of the menacing, reactionary forces arrayed against them.

It is unfortunate that many of the younger generation are unfamiliar with Heschel and his writing. For here was a man capable of igniting the once fiery, but seemingly now only smoldering passions of youthful idealism and activism.

Heschel deeply believed and fervently taught the notion that human life is relevant, not only because God created us, but also because God has high hopes and aspirations for us.

His biography, called Abraham Joshua Heschel: Prophetic Witness, Yale University Press, recently came across my desk. Co-authored by Edward L. Kaplan and Samuel H. Dresner, the latter, Heschel's student, it is a magnificent book.

First and foremost, the reader receives an in-depth, comprehensive view of Heschel's private early life, of his youthful formative years, and of the self-doubts and struggles as a student and aspiring teacher.

Second, the book paints a rich portrait of Jewish life during the first four, pre-Holocaust, decades of this century in Warsaw, Vilna and Berlin.

Third, we read of and encounter up close, some of the exciting scholars – Martin Buber, Leo Baeck, David Koigen, to name just three – who inhabited Heschel's world.

The volume is the first part of the authors' two-part biography of their subject. It takes the reader up to Heschel's escape from Poland in 1939.

I eagerly await the publication of the second volume. Heschel adapts to his new country, eventually evolving into one of its chief spokespersons for conscience, justice and moral order.

Readers of The CJN will notice certain changes in our page 2 masthead this week.

Paul Lungen's name no longer appears there. After 15 years as a staff reporter with The CJN, Paul has decided to go back to school to seek additional higher, different and newer education.

Paul's "beats" were among the most complicated and most sensitive at the paper. Most of the time he had to contend with issues such as the prosecution of alleged former Nazis living in Canada, the proliferation of hate crimes and hate literature, inter-organizational communal rivalries, and day school funding.

Paul was also the editor of The CJN's popular weekly sports page for which he demonstrated an uncanny flair at finding the conventional as well as the "off-beat" professional, amateur and school sports story. Thankfully, Paul will still continue to file or arrange for the filing of sports stories.

It has been a privilege to work with Paul. He combines fine writing skills, sharp analytic acuity, and a delightful sense of humour with rare, uncompromising integrity.

In this day and age, 15 years may be a long time for an individual to remain working with the same employer, but it is not too long a time for us to have worked with Paul Lungen. We will miss him a great deal; but of course wish for him the best of fortune in all his endeavors.

When one thing ends, however, something new begins.

There are other changes this week on the page 2 masthead.

Carolyn Blackman joins The CJN as a staff writer. Carolyn has been a regular freelance writer for the paper and recently, one of our copy editors.

In addition, Anna Morgan joins The CJN as a copy editor.

Both Carolyn and Anna will add a great deal to the paper.

We welcome them. MBD

Hadassah-WIZO helps women hone leadership skills: president

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
CJN Staff

Carol Lou Spiegel

TORONTO — Carol Lou Spiegel, newly installed president of Toronto Hadassah-WIZO credits the organization with her success in the business world.

"The leadership skills I developed as a 25-year member, carried over into every aspect of my life. After a term as bazaar chair, which is just like running a big business, I felt empowered to venture into business myself," said Spiegel, a real estate agent.

Hadassah-WIZO is dedicated to the health, social welfare and education of women and children in Israel, as well as the enrichment of Jewish life in Canada. Local programs focus on such things as women's health, legal issues, and political affairs.

Spiegel said that her sister, MPP Elinore Caplan, honed her leadership skills in the organization as well.

"In addition to leadership development, each person is trained within their own chapter by taking on various tasks. Women can take these skills out of the organization and use them in every aspect of their lives."

Spiegel, one of the first presidents to work outside of the organization, said that working women form the image of today's Hadassah-WIZO, which now has about 3,000 members in over 70 chapters in Toronto.

"I like to think of the organization as encompassing all women. The member focus now is on vibrant, ageless women who are joining because of our exciting programming, and the desire to keep a link with Israel and our own community."

Women today, she said, have less time to give, but meetings have been adapted to meet particular needs. "We have a group for women with young babies, and members have found that it is a perfect time in their lives to bond with other women, as well as keep active in the community."

The personal value members get from contributing to our organization goes far beyond receiving a pay cheque, Spiegel said.

"There are long-lasting rewards. Women who join us inevitably feel valued and satisfied."

Spiegel, wife of Harvey Spiegel, a judge of the Superior Court of Ontario, and mother of two children, ages 26 and 25, said that women who do volunteer work are great role models for their family. "I helped my mother at the annual bazaar when I was a teenager."

Chabad congregation serves large Israeli population

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO – The congregation of the Chabad Israeli Community Centre hopes to soon break ground for a new site to be built at the northwest corner of Centre and Bathurst in Thornhill.

It now has its own shul, with a daily minyan, Shabbat services, to which over 100 come, and an overflow High Holy Day Service. It meets at the moment at the Chabad Community Centre on Chabad Gate in Thornhill.

Israelis' experience with religious institutions is quite different than that of Jews in North America, said Rabbi Yisroel Landa, Lubavitch shaliach to Toronto's Israeli community.

They use the language of the Bible in everyday life, they served in the army, they lived in Israel, he said. "They feel Jewish – they don't see any need to affiliate."

The problem, he said, is that while the parents feel fully Jewish, the children don't get what kids here get educationally. "The parents are educated in Tanach and other Hebrew sources, and the children speak Hebrew. But they don't know who Abraham was."

As well, Rabbi Landa said, in Israel, all religious needs, including synagogues, are provided by the government, and Israelis here don't see any reason to have to pay for them.

Lubavitch saw the need to do something for Israelis, who, they felt, would lose what little connection to Jewish practice and the Jewish community they did have. "Out of a rumored 35,000 Israelis in Toronto, less then one third are in day schools," Rabbi Landa said.

The 35-year-old, Israeli-born, rabbi was raised in Kfar Chabad, and received smichah from the Lubavitch yeshiva in New York. At the end of 1990, he and his new bride, Rachel, came here as shiluchim to the Hebrew speaking community.

This was not his first exposure to Toronto – while still a yeshiva student, he spent two summers here helping out the local Lubavitch community.

While there had been some programs for Israelis before, Rabbi Landa proposed a new philosophy when he approached the Berman Fund of Federation/UJA for assistance.

"I suggested that we not try to Canadianize them, but that we should create a community around them," he said.

"We wanted to create the sense of a large family," he said, "not to necessarily make them daven or even to learn, but to feel connected to each other."

They had parties and gatherings around holidays and special events, and created a sisterhood. There were lectures and concerts, demonstrations, Friday night dinners and bar and bat mitzvah programs. Everything was done in Hebrew.

Two separate university groups have been formed which will hold discussions in Hebrew. Rabbi Landa hopes to have a day school some day.

Rabbi Landa said that many have now started to say Kiddush on Shabbat, and to have special Shabbat gatherings.

On Sept. 5, Labor Day, they will finish writing a sefer Torah, which will be used in the new facility.

Rabbi Landa said that they are relying on the local community to help financially. "These people served in the army on our behalf. Most have had some loss in their family. They deserve to be served as a community."

The rabbi is a seventh generation Lubavitcher Chassid. His grandfather and father were chief rabbis of Bnei Brak and established kashrut supervision there. They have the distinction to be among the few who have the recipe for Coca Cola, as they give kashrut certification for it.

Israeli highway opponents target finance company

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
CJN Staff

TORONTO — A group of 20 protesters who demonstrated outside the head offices of Newcourt Credit Group Inc., marched up to the executive offices to confront president Steve Hudson about his company's role in the construction of a new super highway in Israel.

Shai Spetgang, organizer of the recent protest, told The CJN the group targeted Newcourt because the commercial finance company is part of an international consortium that has the contract to build the Cross Israel Highway, a 300 km 10-lane toll highway which will cost more than $1 billion.

Spetgang, 23, an environmental studies student at York University and head of Canadian Friends of the Committee for Public Transportation in Israel, said the proposed highway will damage the environment, reduce the amount of nature and army reserves by 10 percent, and will spur massive real estate development which will further reduce the remaining open space by 30 to 50 percent.

Opposition to the highway is mounting because a court challenge to the construction of the highway will be heard by the Israel Supreme Court the first week in August, he said. "Many people are questioning the validity of government [feasibility] reports. The opposition is not specific to any party or religious orientation...

"The objective of the [Toronto] protest is to make Newcourt aware of the growing opposition around the world and in Israel, to the highway project."

The protesters were not able to speak directly with Newcourt's top executive, but Hudson's assistant, Mac Penney, met the demonstrators to hear their concerns. Reiterating an earlier statement released by the company, he told them that studies conducted by the government of Israel supported the project.

He said Newcourt was aware of opposition to the project in Israel, but ultimately it was the government that would determine the fate of the highway. "The company's view is that, good or bad, it's best decided by the government of Israel."

Pressed about Newcourt's corporate responsibility vis-a-vis the environmental impact of the highway, Penney said, "We have a responsibility to ensure that we abide by the policy of the government."

Spetgang said a parallel Israeli protest had taken place earlier that day outside the Ashkelon Holiday Inn, the venue of a conference – the first day was dedicated to transportation issues – attended by Israel's top entrepreneurs and politicians, among them Prime Minister Ehud Barak.

He noted that the demonstrations were timed to coincide with the second anniversary of the Maccabia bridge disaster. The collapse of the bridge at the opening ceremonies of the 1997 games led to the deaths of four Australian athletes.

Documentary filmmaker Simcha Jacobovici, a participant in the protest, said the anniversary of the Maccabia disaster was significant because the bridge over the Yarkon River in Tel Aviv was hastily built.

"The destruction of the ecology is contrary to Zionism," Jacobovici said. "We're turning the country into an ecological disaster. We're letting business drive decisions, instead of doing what's good for Israel."

His words were echoed by York sociology professor Stuart Schoenfeld, another demonstrator. "I think everyone here wants to see Eretz Yisrael yaffa and that's endangered by this highway project which cuts through the last open space in the centre of the country..."

By modeling the Israeli highway after Toronto's Highway 407, the Israeli government "is exporting a solution for Toronto into an ecological region that's highly fragile, and it will have severe long-term consequences of degrading the environment...Israel has a high population density which makes it attractive to have mass transit."

Singles Registry closing its doors

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Modern technology has claimed one of Toronto's better-known services for Jewish singles.

Competition from the Internet's many online matchmaking sites has spelled the end of the seven-year-old Jewish Singles Registry, which had offices on Eglinton Avenue East.

Owner and operator Rob Singer told The CJN the service has folded due to mounting costs and high-tech competition.

The Internet "played a big part" in his decision to end the business, Singer said.

Three part-time employees will lose their jobs.

Over the years, the private, for-profit service maintained a client list of about 1,700, Singer said, of which about 600 were active at any time.

Clients paid $395 for an open-ended, unlimited membership.

Singer said he will give no cash refunds. A recorded telephone message on the service's line says paid-up clients will receive credit in the form of tokens which can be used for an on-line Jewish dating service called jmatch.

The service, at www.jmatch.com, operates worldwide. Singer says it charges $1 per contact made, and "tokens" cost $1 each.

Clients of the Jewish Singles Registry are not automatically members of jmatch. They must first register online.

There are roughly 800 Jewish singles from the Toronto area registered on jmatch, Singer estimated.

He said he will now try to sell the registry's database.

He said reaction from clients has ranged from shock to surprise, to sadness.

The registry, he said, was not a matchmaking service. It was clients who chose potential mates from profiles and photographs.

Over the years, the registry's efforts have resulted in some 45 marriages, Singer said.

"I'm very disappointed. I put seven years into this. I guess technology caught up with us."

For those who do not use the Internet, Singer recommends one of Toronto's several cyber-cafes, where individual e-mail accounts may be set up.

The end of the Jewish Singles Registry comes four years after Jewish Dateline, a community-supported matchmaking service, closed its doors.

Ben-Gurion University to honor developers

TORONTO — The Toronto chapter of the Canadian Associates of Ben-Gurion University of the Negev will honor Greenpark Homes and its three founding partners at a special dinner to be held at the Sheraton Centre Hotel on Oct. 19.

The partners – president and CEO Carlo Baldassarra, Jack Wine and Philip Rechtsman – are all recipients of Ben-Gurion University's highest award of distinction, the Ben-Gurion Negev Award. Each will receive a 3,000-year-old antiquity from the Negev.

Greenpark's founders are being honored for their years of leadership. The event will recognize Greenpark's generous contributions to worthy causes across Ontario throughout the company's 32-year history.

Ben-Gurion University, which is situated in Israel's Negev Desert, was established by the Israeli government specifically for the development of ways to make desert life as positive and productive as possible.

Known for its environment studies and research programs, Ben-Gurion University attracts students from 42 different countries with desert or arid terrain. More than 800 million people live in desert environments throughout the world.

Carlo Baldassarra

Philip Rechtsman

Jack Wine

Proceeds from the event at the Sheraton Centre will be used for environmental research, especially in the fields of water resources and desert food production.

Of special significance will be the construction of a greenhouse, made by Agrispace of Montreal. Painstakingly developed as a simple and cost-effective structure, this greenhouse actively captures, utilizes and conserves solar energy. The structure is an advanced solution to the long-standing challenge of providing buildings with abundant natural light that do not cost a lot to heat and cool.

Research in the greenhouse will have a practical Canadian application: it will explore the possible year-round production of fresh vegetables in the remote and isolated areas of northern Canada.

The co-chairs for this function are Sam Ciccolini, a partner of Masters Insurance Ltd.; J. Duncan Gibson, vice-chair of the commercial banking division of the TD Financial Group; and Barry Lipson, counsel at the firm of Torkin Manes Cohen and Arbus.

Program co-ordinator finds new purpose in career with seniors

Spotlight

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
CJN Staff

Janet Klein-Slavin

Janet Klein-Slavin, program co-ordinator for Bathurst Jewish Centre's (BJC) 55+ department, and volunteer co-ordinator at Lincoln Place Nursing Home, has seen her career come full circle.

Five years ago, after 17 years working in fashion design and merchandising, Klein-Slavin, the daughter of survivors, left her job to head the Canadian branch of the Survivors of the Shoah Visual History Foundation, created by Steven Spielberg to document, on video, the world's largest library of Holocaust survivor testimonies.

"Working at the Shoah Foundation, I heard about life and communities being destroyed. Now, at the BJC and Lincoln Place, I see people learning and being active."

Her career at the foundation took off, she said, after she helped her late father launch a self-published book about the Holocaust. "Someone approached me and said that Steven Spielberg could use my commitment. I chased him down, and sold myself to him. I spoke from my heart and told him he would not regret his decision."

While at the foundation, she heard the testimonies of over 3,000 survivors. "When the job was finished this past November, I wondered what I could do next that is as valuable as what I had been doing. I had to wake up in the morning and have a purpose."

She did return to the fashion industry for two weeks, "but I felt that I had many more important things to do, and I resigned. I put closure on that part of my career."

Her work at BJC and Lincoln Place, she said, also put closure on her career at the foundation. "At Lincoln Place, I see residents enjoying a musical performance and I see that they have come full circle from those whose lives were destroyed. These people are enjoying life to its fullest. At the BJC, I get such satisfaction from seeing capable, able-bodied seniors being active."

Lincoln Place, said Klein-Slavin, is a very well-kept secret. "I investigated it before I joined, and I saw a place where seniors are well looked after. It is sad to see the circle of life wind down, but given that, the residents at Lincoln Place are in a good situation."

The nursing home has a synagogue, and often features Jewish entertainment. "It is amazing, how at vulnerable times, anything traditionally Jewish becomes a bright light."

Her own parents were older than those of her friends, she said, and she grew up surrounded by older people. "There is something about the seniors I work with that bring me back to my grandparents. I see so much experience, history and tradition when I talk to people at work. It is a link, for me, to my own Jewish history."

Sad anniversaries... in Argentina

Last month, on July 18, the Jewish world and specifically our Argentinian co-religionists, marked the fifth anniversary of the bombing of the Argentine Mutual Israel Aid (AMIA) Jewish Community Centre in Buenos Aires. The life-shattering bomb exploded at a time calculated to destroy as many Jewish lives as possible, at seven minutes to nine in the morning, the busiest part of the day, when workers and visitors alike were rushing to arrive at the building. Eighty-six people were killed by the blast. More than 300 were wounded.

This was not an act of political violence. The bomb was not aimed at a political or ideological foe. It was an act of ethnic, religious violence. The bomb was aimed at Jews.

Two years earlier, also in Buenos Aires, craven murderers, motivated by the same hatred of Jews killed 29 people when they bombed the Israeli Embassy.

Although 20 people, of whom 15 are police officers, have recently been arrested for their alleged involvement in the AMIA blast, both bombings remain unsolved. The official in charge of the AMIA investigation, federal Judge Juan Jose Galeano, recently accused the Iranian-backed Hezbollah of having been involved in both the '95 and '98 actions.

The 250,000-strong Jewish community in Argentina is outraged at the heartsick possibility that no one will ever be brought to justice for the murders. Lately, however, the community is also deeply worried. The recent failure of two Jewish-owned banks that have traditionally been the primary funders and lenders of community institutions, along with a spate of bolder more brazen acts of anti-Semitism, have trickled their harmful effects throughout the collective psyche of the community.

The JTA recently reported "the seventh largest Jewish community in the world [Argentina] is experiencing growing internal political and social crises in the wake of recent economic upheavals and unresolved anti-Semitic attacks."

The leaders of Argentina's Jewish community recently turned to the Jewish Agency for financial assistance to help them secure the institutions of their communal infrastructure. Itself under severe financial pressures, and not wishing to alter the precedent of its traditional role, the agency rejected the request for such funding. AMIA and the agency, however, continue to discuss other financial and security matters.

Notwithstanding the differences and disagreements at the official Jewish organizational level, it is imperative we express our support to our fellow Jews in whatever manner that pragmatics allow and conscience abides. At the very least, we must not forget the enormous tragedy that befell our fellow Jews five years on July 18.

...and in Australia

It is also imperative that we express our support to our fellow Jews in Australia. On July 14, they marked the second anniversary of the collapse of the bridge at the Maccabiah Games in Israel, as a result of which four Australian athletes died and a number were severely injured. The worst of the injuries was the painful, sorrowful case of young Sasha Elterman, a talented tennis player. She has undergone more than 30 surgeries to deal with medical problems associated with her fall into the toxic Yarkon River. We must not forget the enormous tragedy that befell our fellow Jews two years ago on July 14.

CHAT offers choices of high standards

I believe that in her recent interesting article on high school choices for girls from religious homes (CJN, July 15), Leila Speisman underestimated the opportunities that CHAT offers.

Our four daughters went to Eitz Chaim from kindergarten to Grade 9, and all four graduated from CHAT. Three of them took advantage of the opportunity to study Talmud at CHAT, which they would not have been able to do at the other schools mentioned by Speisman. Three of them went on to further their limudei kodesh by studying in Eretz Yisrael after high school, and all four today continue their Jewish studies by attending shiurim or similar forms of participation. Two of our three married daughters cover their hair, as do a number of their married female former CHAT classmates.

But in addition to some of those strengths in learning and observance that were encouraged by some of the very fine teachers they experienced at CHAT, their interaction with such a wide range of students from across the community has given them an immeasurable advantage that has been repeatedly reflected in their current lives in their abilities to relate comfortably and warmly with a very wide range of people from the general non-Jewish community as well as across the total Jewish community, from the most religious to the most secular.

While the first half of Speisman's article was understandably focused on some recent divisive matters within the religious community, I think it is important to remind your readers that we are fortunate in Toronto that people of vision have established a number of institutions that offer choice. And while some parents with perhaps too narrow a perspective may insist that for their child or children there is but one ideal choice, the objective reality is that there is choice for everyone, and that even within the Orthodox community CHAT offers very high standards of learning and some very fine teacher role models.

Muslim Albanians were victims of Milosevic

Herb Landis tells us (CJN, July 8) that during World War II (60 years ago) Muslim Albanians and German and Croatian Nazis massacred two million Serbs. He refers to the recent slaughter of 20,000 Muslim Albanians by Serbs and calls this an act of retaliation. (The rapes and uprooting of hundreds of thousands seem not to be worth mentioning.)

I would like to point out that the overwhelming majority of Muslim Albanians who cooperated with the Nazis 60 years ago are dead, and the overwhelming majority of the Muslim Albanians slaughtered, raped, and expelled by Slobodan Milosevic a while ago are innocent people.

No justification for ethnic cleansing in Albania

"Suggest hidden agenda in NATO bombing" (CJN, July 5), by Herb Landis really appalled me.

His approach to what happened in Kosovo, namely that retaliation by the Serbs killing the Kosovars because they are Muslims and were responsible for killing millions of Serbs during World War II is justified, boggles the mind.

In his own words: "Can any people with any pride not try to retaliate against such diabolical dastardly deeds?" Does that mean that we go on a rampage against the Germans for killing six million Jews? Do we continue to foment hatred forever – Irish Protestants against Catholics, Arabs against Jews, Muslims against whoever – unto the next generations?

No matter what NATO's hidden agenda, there is no justification for ethnic cleansing or genocide. Life is too short to continue to carry this bile around with us.

Addition to letter on Kosovo situation

In my letter of July 8, I meant to add the following: The 20,000 Muslim Albanians supposedly killed by the Serbs in recent months, which the media keep telling us about, are in reality a mixture of Muslim Albanians and Serbs who were killed over a period of 10 years in the civil war that has been raging for that length of time in the Serbian province of Kosovo.

Perspectives

The transistor radio

By ADINA ESHEL
Special to The CJN

On the day of the first yahrzeit of her dear, beloved, unforgettable husband, Mrs. Gold found herself sitting on a bench in the little square near her home. It was "their bench," on which they used to sit and watch their grandchildren ride on their bicycles, or play with their ball when visiting with them.

Across the street she could see the small café to which they used to take their grandchildren for their special treats: ice-cream topped with whipped cream and sweet cherries in the summer, and hot chocolate and cake in the winter. Sometimes, in the evening, they'd sit there with friends.

The day was quite warm, and Mrs. Gold felt a glass of ice-coffee would cheer her up a little, but she could not do it. How could she enter the café alone? How could she enter any crowded place alone? They always did it together. Even a full year after his passing away, she could not do it. She tried hard to control herself, but the tears burst out against her will.

They were childhood sweethearts. They grew up together, graduated from high school together, and started university together. He studied chemistry and she studied literature and the arts. In the middle of the second year they got married. In the middle of the third year, she gave birth to their first child — a beautiful baby girl. She interrupted her studies, confident she would return to complete them and get her degree, but she never resumed her studies.

Her young, beloved husband subtly conveyed to her, never saying so in words, that he wanted her at home with their child, and later on with their four children, and she complied. In return, he took care of all material matters. Of course, over the years they did have their problems and differences of opinion, but they solved them quietly among themselves.

After their second child was born, they made aliyah and never regretted it. Her husband became a senior chemist in an important chemical firm and later on its director. They had a beautiful house in a prestigious suburb, which they gave up only a few years before, when it grew too big for them, after the children got married and left.

Moving into town revived their old quest for outings. They went out more often than before, mostly to concerts. Both of them loved music, and enjoyed listening to records together.

Every summer they took a trip abroad, and after her husband retired they travelled twice a year, always together.

They devoted much time and attention to their grandchildren, whom they loved dearly. When they took the flat in town, they made a point that it should be within walking distance from both children, who lived in the same town (the other two lived on a kibbutz), so that their grandchildren could come and visit them whenever they wanted.

Just when everything seemed so perfect, her dear husband passed away. He went to sleep and never got up. For the first time in 50 years, she was alone. She had long forgotten how one gets about when one is alone.

The suddenness of his death shattered her world to pieces. He was a healthy man and she had not the time to get used to the idea, as people usually do when their beloved ones are seriously ill for some length of time. It was a sudden shock she could not overcome. She even contemplated suicide.

Tears streamed down her face as she reflected on her life since her husband's death and her lack of self-confidence.

"Why would a lovely woman be crying her heart out?"

Mrs. Gold was startled by the voice. A man was speaking to her in English. She looked up. An elderly man was towering over her, looking worried. She did not answer.

"Please, I mean no harm, can I help you?" asked the man.

She did not answer, but moved her head.

"It can't be that bad," said the man softly.

She examined him. He was very tall, with curly white hair partly hidden under a wide brimmed hat. His eyes were deep blue and expressive. He seemed truly interested.

"May I sit down?" he asked. "Perhaps if you told me what it's all about, you'd feel better."

Somehow his eyes and voice convinced her, and she said, "My husband died."

"I'm sorry," he said, "and I know exactly how you feel."

He kept quiet for a while and then asked: "Would you care to have a cup of coffee with me, and talk about it? I know talking about it helps."

She moved her head. No, she couldn't.

"Would you care to talk about it as we sit here?"

Again she looked into his kind, worried, eyes — and began talking.

She told him the story of her life, which was actually the story of their life, her husband's and hers. She told him about their love for music, and the concerts that she now avoided because she couldn't enter the concert hall alone; about her problem with other places they used to frequent together that she now avoided for the same reason. She told him how badly she missed her husband.

> 'The suddenness of his death shattered her world to pieces'

The stranger listened without interrupting her. It was the first time she told anybody the complete story. When she finished, she felt relieved. He was right, talking about it, particularly to a stranger, does help.

"Tell you what," said the man, "wait here for a few minutes and promise me you won't go away. Perhaps I can help you. I'm going to my car that is parked in the nearby parking lot, I'll be back in less than five minutes."

She nodded and he hurried to his car. In less than five minutes he was back.

"Now close your eyes and open your hand," he told her.

Oddly enough, she did as asked. The man put something in her palm and closed her fingers on it. She could not guess what it was.

"You may open your eyes," said the man.

She opened her eyes, and her palm, and saw a small, black, rectangle-shaped object.

"Do you know what it is?" asked the man.

"No," she said.

"Then perhaps these will help you," he said and produced a pair of small earphones.

"Oh, it's a transistor radio!" she exclaimed in surprise. "It's so small, like a toy."

"It's the best on the market," he said. "I can assure you that you'll enjoy the music you'll listen to, as if in a concert hall."

He plugged the earphones into the tiny radio and she put them on and listened. It was amazing. The music she heard came from all directions; the violins from one side, the cellos and contrabass from the other, and the wind instruments from the front, exactly as if she were sitting in a concert hall!

For the first time she smiled at the stranger.

"It's yours," he said. "Keep it and enjoy your music." Then he got up.

"It's been nice meeting you," he said, and went away. She didn't even have time to thank him.

Mrs. Gold felt quite silly. What had she done? Accepted a gift, probably an expensive one, from a stranger! But what a gift! She still had her earphones on and was enjoying the music she was listening to.

When the concert came to an end, she put the tiny, palm-sized transistor radio into her pocket and went to see her daughter.

Upon hearing the story, her daughter looked at the object and said: "Are you crazy? Accepting a silly toy from a total stranger?"

"Yes," said Mrs. Gold, "I do feel so silly, but this is no toy, this is something very special, listen to it and you'll understand what I mean."

Her daughter put on the earphones and listened. Her face became serious and then looked surprised.

"I see what you mean," she said. "But why would a total stranger give you an expensive gift?" she asked her mother.

"I don't know," answered the mother. "He seemed to be a tourist."

"Well, perhaps he is an agent of the firm that produces these things and keeps some samples in his car," suggested her daughter.

"Perhaps," answered Mrs. Gold.

Smiling inwardly to herself she thought: And perhaps he was Elijah the Prophet in disguise, who according to Jewish legend helps people in distress. No doubt her beloved husband, still taking care of her from above, had sent him to her.

Overlooked minorities

A distant cousin of mine who lives in Hawaii and spent many of his adult years as a judge, sent me the text of an address he delivered before a distinguished group of U.S. civic and political leaders on Memorial Day. Being a veteran of the army of the United States, I still feel some affinity to the observance of that day, which recalls experiences in my life that have left their imprint upon me.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

The address James Dannenberg delivered contains some interesting facts and raises significant questions.

He reviewed the way in which the United States recognized the achievements of its soldiers in the various wars the nation fought. He reminded the audience that the first man ever to die for America was Crispus Attucks, a black man who was killed during the Boston massacre of 1770. Many blacks fought at Bunker's Hill and Lexington and made a valiant contribution to an emerging nation that would not free its black minority for another 90 years.

Black soldiers continued to be segregated, and during World Wars I and II, African American and Asian American GIs were not given many opportunities to go into combat. Yet when they did, they fought admirably, even if recognition came slowly or not at all. During World War II, nine African Americans were awarded the Distinguished Service Cross, the nation's second highest award for heroism, but not one was awarded the Medal of Honor, the nation's highest award.

Similarly, more than 50 Japanese Americans, Philippine and Chinese Americans and one American of Korean background were awarded the Distinguished Service Cross, but only one Medal of Honor was awarded to any of these minorities.

Did the Jews fare any differently? Dannenberg comes to the conclusion that they did not. While 112 Jewish servicemen were given the Distinguished Service Cross or the Navy Cross, only two received the Medal of Honor. On the average, about 15 Distinguished Service Crosses were awarded for every Medal of Honor, but amongst the Jews and other minorities, this was not the case. Dannenberg suggests that these figures reflect the prejudice of the time.

When at last this was brought to the attention of the public, the government reviewed the records and in 1997 awarded Medals of Honor to nine deceased black Americans. It so happens that my cousin comes from parents and grandparents who distinguished themselves by the service they rendered as soldiers in various American wars, and the idea that justice has to be brought to large numbers of valiant men and women has become a major theme of his efforts. It seems that at last the American government is beginning to hearken to pleas like his.

I do not have the figures at hand that apply to Canada, and if any of my readers has access to them, I shall be glad to share them in a future column. I suspect that, on the whole, Canada will not be greatly different from the United States. Prejudice against minorities is an invidious disease that knew and knows no borders, I would love to find out that I am wrong in this instance, and that Canada treated its minority soldiers with true equality.

Israel airing important new issues

As Ehud Barak put the finishing touches on his cabinet, speculation ran high, particularly with regard to the fate of Yossi Beilin and Shlomo Ben-Ami. Both of them had been contenders for the Labor leadership against Barak in 1997, and later, they won senior placement on the Labor list for the 1999 election. Beilin is the more seasoned politician of the two, but both he and Ben-Ami stand out as thoughtful, creative men who challenge prevailing wisdom.

Shira Herzog in Toronto

Ben-Ami coined the Israeli version of a social contract, arguing that the Labor party had to reach out to disaffected sectors in Israeli society from whom it had become alienated. Beilin, the architect of Oslo, has recently been in the forefront of the drive to extricate the IDF from Lebanon. Both men displayed an unwavering loyalty to Barak during the election campaign, and both expected senior portfolios – foreign affairs or finance.

Barak made cabinet appointments his way. Beilin was appointed minister of justice, and Ben-Ami was offered the internal security portfolio. Both were disappointed, but accepted the offers. Early indications are that Beilin, at least, will use the justice portfolio as creatively as he has used every political opportunity in the past. The intricate legalities of Israel's security affairs place him at the centre of the debates on peace and security as well as the rule of law.

In recent weeks, Beilin's voice has already been heard on two important, security-related issues. In taking a contrary position on both, Beilin has again spawned an intense reaction from the Opposition as well as members of the government.

The first issue relates to Israel's undertaking in the Wye agreement – to release Palestinian prisoners. Israel's position had traditionally ruled out release of prisoners with "blood on their hands," defined as those who had committed, assisted, or been members of terrorist cells that had engaged in acts of terror.

The defence establishment has recently proposed a loosening of this restriction. Beilin, for his part, questions it altogether, once four Israeli prime ministers have met and negotiated with Yasser Arafat and Abu Mazen. He proposes a new definition that would rule out release only of prisoners who committed acts of terror after Oslo, or who oppose the peace process.

The second issue cuts far deeper into the heart of Israeli democracy and its historic treatment of civil rights in the face of an overriding security imperative. For 50 years, his government had the authority to automatically declare an emergency situation. (The government consistently used this power, so that in effect, an emergency situation has prevailed since 1948.) This allowed it to override certain rights, such as the right to strike, but also to detain suspects in administrative detention, confiscate property, and a wide range of activities detailed in 14 laws that derive their standing from the emergency situation.

In 1996, the government's authority was limited, with the provision that it must bring the request for reinstating the emergency situation before the Knesset.

Now, Beilin has appointed a task force to review the validity of the emergency situation. He and others, like MK Dedi Zuker and the Association for Civil Rights in Israel, are questioning the range of powers, and the ease with which they can be invoked in a western democracy like Israel. While all of them acknowledge the need for the government to deal effectively with the threat of terrorism, they believe that in the past, the government has taken advantage of its power. For example, since 1983, the government has used emergency regulations against striking workers 30 times a year.

On the other hand, Zachi Hanegbi, minister of justice in the Netanyahu government, believes that the status quo should be maintained, even though it often creates difficult dilemmas for the judiciary. He maintains that terrorism will not decrease as the peace process moves forward, and therefore that the views of the security establishment should be listened to seriously in this debate.

Neither of these issues would have been publicly aired several years ago.

Simply raising them is yet another indication of the evolution of Israeli society and the strengthening of its civil components. Beilin and Zuker represent those Israeli voices who put the rights of the individual and the transparency of the democratic process first, and who question the blanket use of security as an overriding reason for questionable actions by government.

Other voices, even within the current government, are equally strong in arguing the other side. Israel is not a democracy like others, they claim, and the use of emergency powers, like the restriction on release of Palestinian prisoners, is an unavoidable element of the harsh Israeli reality. As Israel moves into its post-conflict era, this will be another cluster of important issues on its agenda.

Religion's role in post-modern society

The week in which I composed this column bore witness to the continuing power of religion as this supposedly modern century and post-modern decade draw to a close. First, the Kennedy tragedy showed us the value of religious belief and ritual in helping people overcome devastating private sorrow.

Morton Weinfeld in Montreal

Most of us watching the tragedy unfold could not help wondering how the two families, the Kennedys and the Bessettes, could deal with such losses. For the Kennedy family, the loss of a cherished son is just one more in a grotesque pattern of premature deaths. For the Bessette family, the loss of two children on the same day is equally unfathomable. What became apparent was that a strong religious faith played a key role in their coping with the tragedies.

Some people may wonder about the decision to cremate and bury at sea. But it is not our business, and well within the accepted bounds of Catholic religious law. By all accounts, both families are sustained by a strong religious faith, by strong and supportive ties to individual congregations, and by valued contacts with specific members of the clergy.

Jews and rabbinic leaders have long recognized the central role of religious ritual in easing the pain of death. The Jewish rituals are far more elaborate and long-lasting than Christian counterparts; they envelope the mourners in a nurturing embrace. Even highly assimilated Jews seem to revert to tradition. A Jewish funeral service, some form of shivah, and the saying of Kaddish and the observance of yahrzeit are common.

There is a second side to religion, namely, its power in the public square. Religion, broadly defined, can mobilize masses of people and threaten governments and undemocratic or unpopular regimes, for better or worse. We recall the role of the Catholic Church in toppling Poland's communist government. Radical Islam remains a destabilizing factor throughout the Middle East.

In China, the Falun Gong movement has emerged as a dangerous challenge to the power of the Communist party. As of this writing, the government in Beijing has arrested hundreds of leaders of the group and thousands of its members who were involved in public demonstrations.

Much remains unclear about the Falun Gong movement. It seems to be based on a mish-mash of influences: part yoga, part tai chi, part Buddhist and Taoist principles, part teachings of a mysterious and cult-like leader. The leader has apparently also confided to western reporters beliefs about alien invaders on earth, and has criticized rock and roll and homosexuality. Some observers are apprehensive that the movement has some features of a self-destructive cult.

So far the movement has not engaged in explicit anti-government agitation. Indeed, millions of Communist party members are also apparently members of Falun Gong, much to the dismay of the party leadership. What probably bothers the party most is the fact that the movement has a spiritual side to it, a source of authority which is outside the party. Philosophical materialism, a cornerstone of both traditional Maoism and the new Chinese capitalism, is threatened by any spiritual force.

The Chinese government faces a difficult dilemma. If it does not crack down on the Falun Gong, the movement may well grow, and the Chinese regime may well go the way of Imperial Rome, the Soviet Union, and Iran under the Shah. If it does try to crush the movement with a mixture of oppressive and co-optation, they may succeed in the short run. But they risk alienating the west and forcing the movement, allegedly numbering tens of millions, underground. A greater explosion may await in the future.

Social theorists throughout this century may not have agreed on much. But one thing most have assumed is that religion would decline as a force in the modern, scientific world, both in the private and in the public sphere. These apostles of modernization have been repeatedly proven wrong. For reasons which are not clearly understood, religion continues to meet the deeper personal needs of human beings while it also serves as a focus for social and political action. And of course, this is certainly true for Judaism.

The Kirshner File

A cornucopia of books...

Summer reading for the serious-minded reader...

Continually in flux, the Middle East is a complex region which all too often defies understanding. Political Encyclopedia of the Middle East (Continuum), edited by Abraham Sela of the Hebrew University, is just the book to guide you safely through the shoals of Mideast politics, economics and social developments. Some 560 entries, ranging in length from 50 to 20,000 words, provide an excellent overview of the area.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Amos Elon's evocative essays on Middle East affairs usually appear in the New York Review of Books and The New Yorker. If by chance you've missed these sparkling gems of prose and perception which illuminate the period and the personalities since the Six Day War, you can reflect upon them at your leisure in A Blood-Dimmed Tide (Columbia University Press).

Peaceful conflict resolution in Israel does not always prevail. From the Altalena incident to Yitzhak Rabin's assassination, violence has reared its ugly head. Ehud Sprinzak, a distinguished Hebrew University political scientist, studies this deadly phenomenon in a first-rate book, Brother Against Brother (The Free Press).

Economics is a dismal but necessary science, and in A History of Middle East Economies (Harvard University Press), Roger Owen and Sevket Pamuk soberly evaluate the economies of Arab states and Israel and speculate on their respective future.

The tension between modernism and theocracy in the Middle East is palpable. Fouad Ajami, in The Dream Palaces of the Arabs (Pantheon), draws on literature, politics and personal experience to paint a compelling picture of the Arab world today.

More often than not, Islam is misunderstood in the West. John Esposito's Islam: The Straight Line (Oxford University Press) explains this dynamic religion in historical context.

Nine years ago, Iraq invaded Kuwait, touching off an international crisis. War in the Gulf: The Iraq-Kuwait Conflict and its Implications (Oxford University Press), by Majid Khadduri and Edmund Ghareeb, delves deeply into the causes of that flashpoint.

What do the Dead Sea scrolls reveal? The Mystery and Meaning of the Dead Sea Scrolls (Random House), written by Hershel Shanks, provides some clear answers.

Should we regard the Bible as the absolute truth? Thomas Thompson, in The Bible in History (Random House), argues cogently that it is a body of literature which reflects the philosophic and moral views of its authors.

What lies at the heart of the biblical book of Genesis? David Rohl examines the sources and the archeological evidence and, in Legend: The Genesis of Civilization (Random House), concludes that they describe a sequence of real historical events.

Tales of raw human passion course through the Bible, and embarrassed rabbis have been known to conceal the plain language of the original Hebrew text behind euphemisms and unlikely interpretations. Jonathan Kirsch, in The Harlot by the Side of the Road (Random House), rips away the veil in a feat of provocative scholarship.

What is the Kabbalah? Neil Silberman, in Heavenly Powers (Grosset), argues that it is really a response to the tyranny of potentates and kings.

If you're struggling to learn Hebrew, you can do no better than to immerse yourself in Hebrew in 10 Minutes a Day (Raincoast), which turns the task into a creative and imaginative process.

Reference books are rarely dull. Two such volumes, Encyclopedia of World History (Oxford University Press) and Oxford Paperback Encyclopedia, prove the point beyond any doubt. The New York Times 1999 Almanac (Penguin) is also worth perusing.

Biographies can be revealing. Cardozo (Harvard University Press), by Andrew Kaufman, is one such bio. It's a workmanlike account of the great U.S. Supreme Court judge, Benjamin Cardozo. Ditto for Howard Greenberg's Ben Shahn: An Artist's Life (Random House), a bracing book about that splendid American painter and muralist.

Who has not heard and fallen under the spell of Fanfare for the Common Man or Appalachian Spring? The Russian-Jewish composer of these beloved pieces is expertly profiled in Howard Pollack's Aaron Copland: The Life and Work of an Uncommon Man (Fitzhenry & Whiteside).

Moses Mendelssohn, the 18th-century German-Jewish thinker, was a seminal figure. David Sorkin, in Moses Mendelssohn and the Religious Enlightenment (University of California Press), analyzes his contributions from a fresh perspective.

Edith Stein, the Jewish-born Carmelite nun who was canonized as a saint, is thoroughly scrutinized by Jewish and Christian scholars in a knowing book of essays entitled Never Forget (ICS Publications).

Claire Drainie Taylor, a Jewish girl from a small prairie town, had a successful career as an actress and radio dialogue writer. Her autobiography, The Surprise of My Life (Wilfrid Laurier University Press), is perky and poignant.

The Shubert brothers were synonymous with theatre in the United States. Foster Hirsch, in The Boys from Syracuse (Southern Illinois University Press), documents their rise from poverty to prominence.

Aficionados of general fiction and Yiddish will appreciate three works published by the University of Nebraska Press – Contemporary Jewish Writing in Britain and Ireland, The Prairie Schooner: Anthology of Contemporary Jewish American Writing, and Anglish/Yinglish: Yiddish in American life and Literature.

In Blacks and Jews in Literary Conversation (Cambridge University Press), Emily Budick intelligently reconstructs the mercurial relationship between Jews and African-Americans. And in his masterful Trouble in Mind (Random House), historian Leon Litwack casts an unerring eye on black pain, as exemplified by the Jim Crow laws which demeaned and exploited blacks in the 19th and 20th centuries.

The doleful place of the Ku Klux Klan in American society is traced by Wyn Craig Wade in The Fiery Cross (Oxford University Press). The fanatical right-wing fringe in the United States is profiled in Danger: Extremism (Anti-Defamation League). Worthwhile companion volumes are The New Lexicon of Hate (Simon Wiesenthal Centre), The Racist Mind: Portraits of American Neo-Nazis and Klansmen (Penguin) by Raphael Ezekiel, and Women of the Far Right (University of Chicago Press) by Glen Jeansonne. In Beyond the Swastika (Routledge), a thorough examination of neo-Nazism in Germany, Peter O'Brien contends that it is overstated.

Fascism is anti-Semitism's handmaiden. In Fascist Italy and Nazi Germany (Routledge), Alexander De Grand studies their similarities and differences. And in Fascism, Past, Present and Future (Oxford University Press), Walter Laqueur sheds considerable light on this chauvinistic ideology.

There are no shortage of books about the apotheosis of fascism, the Holocaust. Reading the Holocaust (Cambridge University Press), by Inga Clendinnen, explores it from the victims' and perpetrators' points of view. Lawrence Langer, in Preempting the Holocaust (Yale University Press), looks rigorously at the use of Holocaust themes in literature, memoirs, films and painting. Eric Rentschler, in The Ministry of Illusion (Harvard), authoritatively charts the course of popular cinema in Nazi Germany.

Our growing problem

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

As the month of Elul approaches, we are reminded that we must begin our preparations for the High Holy Days.

During Elul it is customary to engage in prayer, study and self-assessment. The midrash states that on Rosh Hashanah each person and each nation is judged. During Elul we must not only assess ourselves as individuals, but also our contributions to our nation.

There are many activities that immediately come to mind; charitable events, issues of hospitality and education are usually at the forefront of community concerns.

Yet beyond these important issues lie other concerns that are equally important. If individuals perceive actions by their community that they consider wrong or misplaced, they have a responsibility to correct those actions. The first step toward this correction is honest community self-evaluation.

I recently had a conversation with some people who were bemoaning the rifts occurring between different branches of Judaism. These people were singling out one branch of Judaism and accusing it of name-calling and insulting another branch.

I told them how sad it was that all groups of Judaism are engaged in this. They agreed, but proceeded to state that their particular branch did not do this. In other words, they could see the problem but could not see all the contributors. This inability to self-assess on a community level inevitably leads to inaction and prolongs the problem.

A time for self assessment

On Rosh Hashanah we will have to explain to God how we as a nation continue to pull ourselves apart. What will we say to justify that we cannot find a way to pray with each other? How can we explain that to prove some point of authority, we cannot find a way to eat together?

How do we account for the fact that although we are encouraged to learn together, no one is encouraged to teach such a class? We are so tangled in a net of justifying who is right and who is wrong that we have deadlocked the Judaic process of growth.

As parents, we know that disputes among our children cannot always be solved based on right and wrong. Often parents cannot even discern who is right or wrong. And yet, we never lose sight of the goal of keeping peace in the home, sometimes at the expense of right and wrong.

Ironically, as Jewish adults, we don't transfer that skill to the problems of Jewish unity.

Many people are bothered by the realities of what they see in the nation, Israel. Unfortunately, many of these same people are confused or afraid to take action because they fear singling themselves out. Yet to do nothing is to contravene everyone's understanding of Torah.

We are all aware of the problems, we have all blamed the other groups. Each branch has loudly asserted its position and its right to hold that position – and the problem grows.

Perhaps this Elul it is time for each person to assess what they can do about the problem beyond simply discussing and acknowledging it.

The midrash tells of the rivers of the world asking the great Euphrates, "Why do you not make your voice more audible?"

The Euphrates responded: "I don't need to – my deeds speak for me."

Internet matchmaking

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Last week we began to look at dating and love on the Jewish Highway. This week we get down to business.

There are probably hundreds of sites on the Internet trying to do the work that Shalom Aleichem's Yente did all on her own. Some of these use the services of real-life matchmakers. Others have you do the work. For example, there is YidYour Ideal Date. [http://www.yid.com] After registering and providing a bio, you can search the database of Jewish singles by sex, city, age and religiosity. When someone catches your eye, you can strike up a conversation by sending off an anonymous e-mail.

On the other hand, Rabbi Yeheskel and Pearl Lebovic believe in a more personal touch. They apply their "God-given ability" to make sound judgments in assessing mutual compatibility and have personally interviewed a majority of the 7,000 registrants in their Likrat Shiduch database [http://www.florida.com/shiduch/].

The folks at Jewish Singles Connection are trying to create a virtual community for Jewish singles around the world [http://www.thejewishpeople.org/jsc/]. They will give you space where you can create your own bio along with a photo, and even set up a link to your home page so that browsers can get to know the real you. This service is free.

One of the most fascinating matchmakers I came across was Shmuel Landau who runs the Orthodox Union's Jewish Deaf Singles Registry [http://www.ou.org/oupr/ourwaymatchmaking.htm]. Apparently, today's high intermarriage rate among Jews is even higher among Jewish deaf people.

"The Jewish deaf person is constantly confronted with the question, 'Am I Jewish or deaf first?' Many choose the latter." Landau, who is deaf himself, spends at least 15 hours every week sorting through letters and counselling deaf singles. This matchmaker has made 14 matches so far.

You can find many other Jewish singles' sites at Maven [http://www.maven.co.il/subjects.asp?S=207], Zipple [http://www.zipple.com/singles/links.html] and Hareshima [http://www.hareshima.co.il/Organizations/dating.asp]. Some of these sites are free. Others require a fee.

Still need help finding your match? Fran Greene is willing to lend some advice. Fran is a singles and relationship counsellor [http://www.jcn18.com/scripts/jcn18/paper/Index.asp?ColumnID=117]. Her online articles include How to Get a Date, Flirting Tips from the Expert, and the Myths and Realities of Personal Ads. She believes that if you are shy or busy, a properly worded personal ad can work for you.

So, do these ads kindle a flame in you? These personal ads have apparently appeared in Israeli and Jewish papers [http://members.rotfl.com/cookie4/cabana.html].

• Couch potato latke, in search of the right applesauce. Let's try it for eight days. Who knows?

• Sincere rabbinical student, 27. Enjoys Yom Kippur, Tisha b'Av, Taanis Esther, Tzom Gedaliah. Seeks companion for living life in the "fast" lane.

• Desperately seeking shmoozing! Retired senior citizen desires female companion 70 for kvetching, kvelling, and krechtzing.

Immigration up in smaller centres

By MICHAEL BRIKS

For the second year, immigration to smaller Jewish communities in Canada is on the rise.

Based upon caseload statistics supplied by Jewish Immigrant Aid Services' national service delivery partners across Canada, the Jewish Community of Ottawa experienced a 61 percent increase in the number of its immigrant families over the past year, while Winnipeg, Calgary and Edmonton reported five percent, 17 percent and 12 percent increases respectively.

Jewish newcomer families to Vancouver slipped 18 percent from last year, but the figure remains substantially high overall at 240 new families reported for the 1998-99 fiscal year. The statistics identify only those newcomer families who are actually known to Jewish family service agencies in smaller communities.

What accounts for the increase in numbers? There are a number of possibilities. Traditionally, new immigrant families are drawn to smaller communities for the same reasons as they are drawn to larger Jewish communities – in order to be reunited with loved ones, such as parents, children, brothers or sisters. Employment opportunities, especially in today's job market, serve as magnets for skilled and highly motivated Jewish newcomers, as well.

In addition, a number of provinces, such as Manitoba, have signed with the federal government what have become commonly known as provincial nominee agreements.

In the case of Manitoba, this agreement allows the province to recruit, screen and nominate prospective immigrants who have the skills to fill specific Manitoba labor market demands and contribute to Manitoba's industrial and economic growth. High demand occupations for Manitoba currently include accountants, aerospace industry technicians, computer programmers and computer systems analysts. Highly skilled early childhood educators and daycare managers are also in need!

Guest Voices

There are several requirements of those immigrants wishing to be nominated to the program, including qualifying for an immigrant visa through Citizenship and Immigration Canada and the procurement of a written offer of employment from an employer in Manitoba, which must comply with the criteria determined by Manitoba's immigrant promotion and recruitment branch. But overall, the nominee program provides a reasonable incentive for a skilled and motivated newcomer to ponder a future in a smaller Jewish urban centre, even if it is on the prairies.

A number of Jewish immigrants naturally gravitate towards smaller communities because of familiarity with such settings in their country of origin, or because they believe such places are more cordial and provide a safer environment for their children than the larger metropolitan areas in the country.

Equally, there is a perception that the cost of living is relatively lower in smaller cities and thus the dollar stretches farther – always an important consideration for the immigrant newcomer.

Fear of depersonalization and fierce competition for scarce resources in larger areas may readily be added to our list of reasons.

An article in the Globe and Mail (May 24), entitled Immigrants Face Underemployment in Toronto, identified that in that metropolitan area, the unemployment rate for Canadian-born men and women in 1996 was six percent. Among recent immigrants, it was 14 percent for men and 21 percent for women. The failure to integrate skilled immigrants, the article further stated, is a serious issue in Toronto.

A relatively new phenomenon, that of active recruitment of potential newcomers to smaller Jewish centres, is also having an impact upon immigration settlement activity in Canada. Several Jewish communities outside the bustling urban areas of Toronto, Montreal and Vancouver have been sadly witnessing a decline in their numbers, particularly among university-age community members who seek higher education elsewhere. Some of those communities have set about, with diligence and determination, to rejuvenate, culturally enrich and increase populations through marketing their cities to potential Jewish immigrants abroad.

Both Windsor and Winnipeg, as examples, have targeted South American sites, namely Sao Paulo and Buenos Aires, to disseminate information about their communities. Their respective agendas are clearly to attract young, professional, synagogue affiliated families, disgruntled with their current political and economic plight, eager for a life of religious freedom and financial opportunities in Canada. In essence, the vision of a better life for themselves and their children in places where Jewish people are reaching out and truly care is not such a bad deal!

Having lived in friendly Manitoba for six years, and knowing the vibrant city of Windsor as I do, I can readily appreciate the lure of the smaller Jewish community for those coming to Canada from abroad.

Composer's recent work features Jewish themes

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to the CJN

Russian-born Toronto composer Yefim Adler is seen with (left) Noreen Green, artistic director and conductor of the Los Angeles Jewish Symphony Orchestra and Canadian Consul General Kim Campbell in Los Angeles.

TORONTO — Yefim Adler, born in Moscow in 1937, arrived in Canada in 1990, bringing little with him except his reputation as a world renowned composer/musician/conductor, and his passion for writing music.

Until he arrived in Canada, Adler had not written music with a Jewish theme. "I always felt that I had a Jewish soul although I did not live as a Jew. You knew you were a Jew even though no one ever mentioned our Jewishness."

He says that things changed in Russia after the Yom Kippur War when Jews were blamed for attacking the Arabs. "That's when I and other Jews began to feel the discrimination and recognized the falsified news."

Adler, who graduated from the Odessa State Conservatoire as a musicologist, received a degree in composition from the Moscow State Gnessin's Music Academy.

Throughout his career in Russia, he wrote two symphonies, a violin concerto, vocal and instrumental compositions for musical theatre, music for children, choral compositions, and music for films, TV and radio.

His walls are filled with clippings and posters of his performances, and his bookshelves hold numerous volumes of his sheet music. He has performed extensively in Russia, East Germany, Poland, Czechoslovakia and Bulgaria.

In 1989, just before leaving Russia, his major composition, Concerto for Violin and Orchestra, was premiered at the Grand Hall of the Moscow Conservatoire.

It was after his two sons moved to Toronto that Efim and his wife Nadia, a professional pianist, decided to follow. They arrived in Canada with only two suitcases.

"Our arrival in Canada was a difficult time, but three people changed our lives – Shirley Hanick of the Jewish Immigrant Aid Services of Canada (JIAS), Cantor Benjamin Maissner of Holy Blossom Temple and the Canadian composer/conductor, Louis Applebaum, who was so helpful in my professional life."

"We didn't even have a chair to sit on or any cutlery, but thanks to Shirley, who has become a close friend, we received furniture, dishes, cutlery and some financial help.

"Then she brought us to Holy Blossom and introduced us to Cantor Maissner. From then on, our life became absolutely different. We will always be grateful to her and to JIAS."

Maissner raised $10,000 for the Adlers, hired Nadia as the choir accompanist and commissioned Yefim to write and arrange some music for a special holiday service.

"Cantor Maissner introduced me to Jewish music. He gave me lots of tapes and scores of Jewish music, and he became my mentor. I found new inspiration in Jewish liturgical music and found the Jewish soul that was really always there."

In 1992, Holy Blossom Temple presented a musical event, The Russian-Jewish Connection, which featured Adler's works performed by Russian violinist Victor Danchenko and other world class performers.

Recently, for JIAS' 75th anniversary, Adler was commissioned to create a work, Jewish Dances, which was performed at the Ford Centre, and in Moscow where he was the guest of honor at the Moscow International Festival of Contemporary Music.

Published in Moscow by a major publishing house, Adler dedicated the piece to "The Jewish People, who have given in the past and continue to give their talent, energy and strength for the welfare of many nations and states."

A Russian musical magazine, Musical Life, recently wrote, "...the composer has created bright concert pieces, attracting with their temperament and masterly orchestration. The author's brilliant techniques of orchestral palette recall the traditions of Russian virtuosos of the orchestra: Rimsky-Korsakov and Stravinsky."

Among his recent compositions are, Your God, Your Glory, Kol Kochve Voker, a new arrangement of Ladino Folk Songs and cantorial and liturgical music.

In Russia, Adler says, composers who belonged to the Union of Soviet Composers were privileged.

"We were treated differently than other Jews in the community. I lived in a protective environment. Musicians and composers lived in a state within a state. Now, that no longer exists in Russia. The privileged life of a composer is gone, and many composers are in terrible shape and dying of hunger – they have no work. Although I love Canada, it is not a place to be an artist and earn a living."

"On one side, I am very happy to be here and on the other side, I suffer as many others do, as a composer."

In April, his composition, Three Pieces for Orchestra, inspired by the paintings of Russian-born Jewish artist, Marc Chagall, was performed in Los Angeles by the Los Angeles Jewish Symphony Orchestra at the city's University Synagogue as part of a celebration of Music of Canadian Jewish Composers.

Along with other Canadian composers, he was a guest at a concert and reception at the official residence of the Canadian Consul General in Los Angeles, Kim Cambell "who was the prime minister when my wife and I became Canadian citizens." He adds that he had no difficulty communicating with Campbell "because she speaks Russian fluently."

Adler says that "one of my greatest joys in life was to marry my wife of 30 years in a Jewish ceremony at Holy Blossom Temple, in February 1998, surrounded by my family and friends. And for the future, my dream is to be able to continue writing music – the other love of my life."

Producer's Quest examines life's big issues

JOSEPH SERGE
Arts editor

TORONTO — Chances are if you ever watch PBS during its pledge weeks you've seen the Quest series; a series of programs dealing with the New Age mantra of making our lives better physically and spiritually.

Produced and directed by Toronto resident Lili Fournier, the series Quest for Life and Quest for Love also ran on TV Ontario.

It features interviews with some of today's most influential thinkers on the meaning of life including John Gray Men are from Mars, Women are From Venus; Barbara Deangelis Real Moments; Deepak Chopra A Path to Love; Thomas Moore Soulmates, Dr. Bernie Siegel Love, Medicine and Miracles and many more.

These philosophers discuss some of the more important parts of our lives. The first quest in the Quest For Life series, for example, dealt with discovering one's human potential – how to improve your self-worth; how to deal with fear and pain and how to reverse aging and improve health.

"I wanted to create a series that will inspire people to find the courage to persevere," Fournier said recently, "and not give in to people's opinions of yourself."

One of the best things about this series is it isn't a hard-sell "10 ways to change your life" infomercial. The guests at times contradict each other which allows the viewer to pick and choose a philosophy that best appeals to him or her.

As the first Quest discusses, people are often concerned with their image – how they look to other people and not to themselves. This series won the Best Motivational TV Program award at the Houston WorldFest Film Festival.

Following its run on PBS which was "hugely popular" (in December it was the second highest pledge program), Fournier followed it up with another trilogy, Quest For Love, which deals with powerful insights to love and relationships.

Again, she managed to tap into the thoughts of the leading thinkers on the subject including Erica Jong. "I consider it a real privilege to get these people to address the deepest things in our lives," Fournier said.

The Quest For Love series deals with love and passion, not just the romantic notion of love. "It explores the various forms of ecstasy. You need passion in life to have sexual passion."

A fourth part in this series, Light My Fire, which deals with lasting passion and intimacy in an enduring relationship, is scheduled to air this fall.

If you haven't seen the series yet, and don't want to wait till the next pledge break, you can check out the website at:www.quest-forlife.com

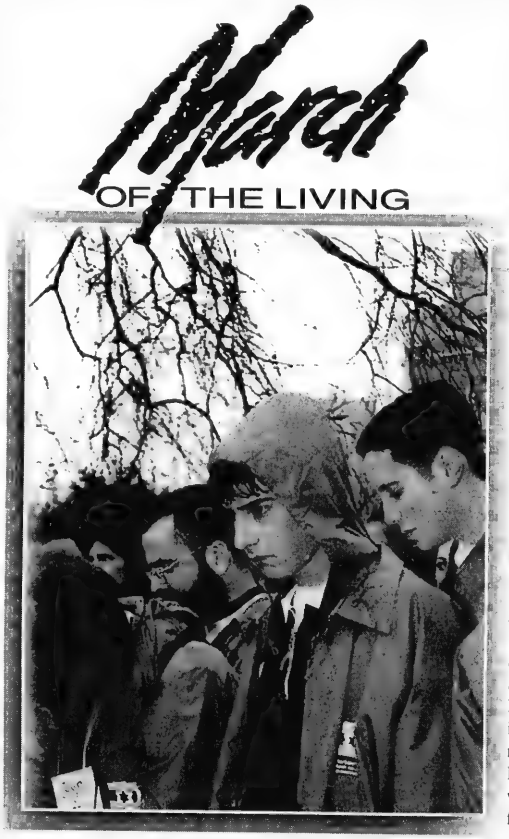
Toronto Societies Kick Off March Fund

Toronto's Societies have helped to kick start UJA Federation's March of the Living Endowment Fund, in order to send more teenagers on an experience which many participants describe as "life altering." UJA Federation's Societies Cabinet is bolstering an overall effort to increase subsidies and the number of young people participating in the program.

The March of the Living takes over 300 Canadian teens to Poland and Israel where they join thousands of others from around the world who march from Auschwitz to Birkenau concentration camps before travelling to Israel.

"The March has a uniqueness that gives our children and grandchildren an opportunity to learn about our past and then face the miracle of Israel," says Michael Rosenberg, who co-chairs the Societies Cabinet with Ralph Snow.

"As a Holocaust survivor and grandfather of a young man who participated in the March of the Living a year ago, I can attest to the tremendous effect the program has on our youth," adds Snow. "My grandson became more sensitive and closer to his grandparents than ever before. For members of the Societies, it is this connection to our Jewish future that makes this Endowment Fund so important."



For Holocaust child survivor and March of the Living chaperone, Anita Ekstein, the March is more than an event - it's an obligation. "I think those of us (survivors) who are alive, have a responsibility to talk about it with young people, if they're able to, because who else will? I guess that's why I do it. I feel I have a responsibility to those who cannot speak for themselves... for those millions of children who didn't make it....and I did."

During this past year, Endowment Fund donations have poured in from many Societies, including: Chmielnicker, Farband of Lithuanian Jews, Keltzer, Ostrovtzer Independent Benefit, Pultusker, Stashiver Young Men & Ladies, Wierzbnicker Friendly Mutual Benefit, and Zaglembier, in addition to the B'nai Brith Raoul Wallenberg Lodge.

Societies were formed around the turn of the century when thousands of destitute immigrant Jews arrived in North America with only the clothing on their backs. In addition, Societies served a social and cultural role, and as they prospered, were also dedicated to special projects within the Jewish community.

Today, the Societies are very active in UJA Federation fundraising. Many community facilities in Israel were built with their generous financial assistance.

For more information on the March of the Living Endowment Fund please call Carol Kassel at (416) 631-5674.

Campaign 2000 Community Launch

Blitzer Headlines Program

CNN's Senior White House Correspondent, Wolf Blitzer, will be the keynote speaker at the UJA Federation Campaign 2000 Community Launch, August 30.

Blitzer, an internationally respected journalist, has covered major breaking stories world wide for over two decades. In 1994, he was cited by the American Journalism Review as the overwhelming choice of readers for providing the "best network coverage of the Clinton administration." In 1996, Blitzer won an Emmy Award for his coverage of the Oklahoma City bombing, and, as CNN's Pentagon Correspondent, he was among a team of reporters who received the prestigious Golden Cable ACE Award for Gulf War reporting. Blitzer's expertise in Middle Eastern issues was honed as the Washington correspondent for The Jerusalem Post.

In a telephone interview with jewish toronto, Blitzer, who interviewed Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Barak during his recent visit to the U.S., says top Clinton administration officials are very "excited and upbeat" about Middle East peace prospects. "They think there's a real opportunity not only to finalize a deal with the Palestinians, but also to get negotiations off the ground with the Syrians."

Wolf Blitzer headlines the Campaign 2000 Community Launch.

Also on the program at the Sheraton Centre is "Changing Lives," a mini-documentary by Emmy Award-winning producer, Simcha Jacobovici.

Making her debut Canadian appearance at the Launch will be Israeli performer, Marina Faingold, who began her career as a celebrated child singer. Faingold has performed for Jewish communities in the U.S., and starred in the Israeli production of West Side Story. She recently sang at an international song festival in Vitbsk, Russia.

"We want to combine some intellectual stimulation, in addition to providing ruach and excitement," says Ronald Appleby, who is co-chairing the Launch with Fran Sonshine.

Advance tickets ($18) for the Campaign 2000 Community Launch can be obtained by calling (416) 631- 5700. They're also available at the door for $20. A kosher dessert reception follows the evening program.

Refugees Return Home

The Jewish Agency for Israel (JAFI) has made it possible for 145 of 217 Kosovo refugees who came to Israel in recent months to return to their homeland. Last week, JAFI flew the departing guests to Macedonia, before they were bused to Kosovo. Seventy-two of the Kosovo refugees plan to stay in Israel until the end of the six-month period granted them by the Government of Israel, which ends in October.

The JAFI campaign to help Kosovo refugees – many of them ethnic Albanians - began during Passover when the Jewish Agency brought the first group of 177 to Israel's Kibbutz Ma'agan Michael. A second contingent of 98 individuals, who arrived a few weeks later, was housed on Kibbutz K'ramim. During their stay, two sabras were born one at each of the kibbutzim - and JAFI organized a variety of cultural and social activities for the refugees. They visited various sites throughout the country, worked on a kibbutz, and studied Hebrew.

Each family returning to Kosovo will receive a cash allotment to help with their resettlement, because their homes were destroyed or looted. The funds will come from money collected during the Kosovo refugee relief campaign.

Relief supplies brought to the Kosovar refugees, organized by the Jewish Agency.

Campaign 2000 Heading for Fifty

UJA Federation's upcoming Campaign 2000 is striving to fund even more new and expanded services than last year for Jews in need. Last year's Campaign for Fifty raised a record $40.5 million, providing additional dollars for a long list of priorities. Campaign 2000 continues the drive to raise $50 million annually by 2001 to assist the vulnerable, strengthen Jewish identity, and rescue Jews in danger.

"With longer life spans and reduced government support, the number of vulnerable Jews is on the rise," says Mel Wolfond, who is co-chairing Campaign 2000 with David Engel. Increased campaign contributions will be allocated to, among other programs, respite services for family caregivers, increased rental and transportation subsidies for the poor, enlarged job preparation and placement programs for Jews receiving government assistance and a residence for Jews with mental illness.

"Strengthening Jewish values by nurturing Jewish roots," is another important priority, according to Engel. Additional campaign 2000 funds will enable more poor children and those with special needs to experience Jewish summer camps, expand programs for Jewish university students, provide special Shabbat weekends for adults with developmental disabilities and create opportunities for the hearing impaired to become more involved in Jewish life.

New campaign donations will also allow the Jewish Agency, funded by the worldwide UJA Federation network, to continue flights to Israel for 3,500 Ethiopian Jews from the remote region of Quara. The Jewish Agency is also anticipating a large increase in aliyah (60,000 total) from Jews of the Former Soviet Union who face rising anti-Semitism and economic collapse.

Rescuing Ethiopian Jews is a priority of Campaign 2000.

Students go to Israel on leadership scholarship program

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Four Canadian students have been selected to take part in the Hillel Leadership Scholarship program in Israel this year.

Torontonians Yael Ben-Dat, Natalie Pakes and Jory Scherer, along with Nava Mizrahi of Vancouver, will be studying at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem.

Scherer is receiving a stipend from Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University (CFHU); the other three have combined scholarships from CFHU and the Hebrew University of Jerusalem. Hillel International, based in Washington, D.C., administers the program.

The students were chosen, along with 17 American counterparts, to participate in the program, which runs at both the Hebrew University and Ben-Gurion University.

The program includes leadership development seminars, and courses in the sociology of North American Jewry and Jewish life in the former Soviet Union. There are also site visits throughout Israel, as well as the opportunity to lead a seder in the former Soviet Union.

Participating students are required to take leadership roles in Israel-related groups on campus, once they return home.

Mizrahi is in the University of British Columbia's honors program in Religious Studies, with a minor in International Relations.

She is interested in the areas of academia, law and Jewish communal service.

Currently she is specializing in Islam and Judaism, and hopes to take Arabic and Islamic Studies when she is in Israel. "I think it's really important to understand their rich culture and heritage as well," she said in a phone interview.

A former international president of B'nai Brith Girls, Mizrahi took an active role at UBC as president of Vancouver Hillel and Israel Week chair, to name a couple of her involvements.

Pakes, 20, is a psychology student with a minor in Jewish Studies at McGill University. She has been involved with Chabad and Hillel, where she studied Gemarah.

An alumna of the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT) and United Synagogue Day School, she has been to Israel four times and hopes to make aliyah. Her year at the Hebrew University will be "the perfect step," she said. "I think it's important to go and try it out for a bit. I want to spend a year in the holiest place in the world."

Scherer, 21, is studying Jewish Education at York University. An alumnus of CHAT and former part-time youth director at Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue, he studied for a year at Israeli yeshivot before entering York, where he has been involved with the Jewish Student Federation.

Scherer is one of the founders of a new Jewish group called "Goat Cheese," a play on the French word chèvre (goat cheese) and the Hebrew word chevra. The group plans to raise money for tzedakah by organizing events such as concerts, he said.

In the coming year, Scherer hopes to hone his Hebrew language skills so that he will feel comfortable teaching Hebrew in the future.

Ben-Dat, 19, is majoring in Psychology and Jewish Studies at the University of Toronto, where she recently completed her second year.

An alumna of Associated Hebrew Schools, CHAT and Camp Ramah, where she worked this summer as a counsellor for campers with special needs. Ben-Dat, like the other participants, expressed enthusiasm about the program.

Along with the academic aspects, she said, "one of the things that is so appealing is that you're putting yourself in an environment surrounded by people seeking similar things to what you're seeking. I'm hoping to find a group of people who share my interests and my passions."

'Donation makes Canadian history'

Cancer research centre receives $20M donation

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

VANCOUVER — The research centre for prostate cancer at Vancouver General Hospital, headed by urologist Dr. Larry Goldenberg, formerly of Toronto, recently received a $20 million donation from a patient.

The donation, made by Jim Pattison, is believed to be the largest charitable donation ever given by an individual to a medical facility in Canada.

"This donation goes beyond generosity. This donation is making Canadian history," said hospital president Murray Martin. "This will certainly allow us to create one of the leading places in the world for prostate research."

Pattison, 70, said that he became excited about the research centre for prostate cancer after listening to Goldenberg's plans to expand and strengthen research.

Goldenberg said the hospital's prostate research and clinical treatment centre, which was opened a year ago, has already gained worldwide reputation.

"I believe that we provide probably the best care for prostate cancer in the world, and now, with the kind of money we are getting, we will be able to press forward even more," said Goldenberg.

Vancouver urologist, Dr. Larry Goldenberg.

He said that prostate cancer will affect some 16,000 Canadian men this year, killing an estimated 4,000. "I believe that scientists are on the verge of some major breakthroughs."

Goldenberg, who attended the Associated Hebrew Schools of Toronto and the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, graduated from the University of Toronto Medical School in 1978 and interned at the Mount Sinai Hospital.

He did his residency at the University of British Colombia and was a winner of a Terry Fox Research Fellowship in cancer endocrinology in 1984.

He is a professor in the department of surgery in the division of urology at the University of British Columbia.

"My research involves the study of novel treatment approaches for all stages of prostate cancer. In patients with early, localized tumors, we have developed and tested clinical protocols in which hormone therapy is administered prior to surgical removal of the prostate.

"For patients with more advanced cancer, continuous hormone therapy has been a mainstay form of treatment."

Goldenberg is the Canadian principal investigator of an international group study of men with metastatic cancer.

Goldenberg said his "outstanding team or researchers have the ability to take research from the bench in the lab to the bedside – what we call translational research."

In making his presentation to the research centre Pattison praised Goldenberg for his vision, passion and determination.

Goldenberg is married to radiologist Paula Gordon. They have two sons, Adam, 12 and Mitchell, 10.

Ottawa gets female mohel

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Dr. Lisa Rosenkrantz considers herself blessed.

She says she has a "wonderful husband, three terrific sons, a rewarding family medicine practice," and as a mohel, she has a special role in the Jewish community.

Before becoming a mohel, she was active in the community, yet she felt her connection was more tenuous, she explains. "I felt very connected to the Jewish community, yet at the same time I felt disconnected...

"The idea of becoming a mohel began percolating in my head after the birth of my third child."

But timing is everything, and at that juncture in her life, time was something she had very little of, she says.

"I had three small children; I was chief of the department of family medicine at the Queensway-Carleton Hospital, I went on a UJA young leadership mission to Israel and became very involved in that, but nothing really pulled the threads and intertwined them."

About two years ago, Rosenkrantz decided to follow her dream. She gave up her position as chief at the hospital to free up some time and she began to seriously investigate the possibility of becoming a mohel.

After some initial reading and discussions with Rabbi Steven Garten of Temple Israel, where she is affiliated, she asked the Brit Milah Board of North America to send her the textbook and course material required for certification.

"Rabbi Garten had trained some mohels when he was in Toronto, as an educator," says Rosenkrantz, "so he brought his own flavor to the process."

In spite of the fact that she had performed close to 2,000 circumcisions in her 18 years of practice in the nearby village of Carp, the study process was intense, she says

"The issue was learning the laws and the liturgy and the history – what it means today in our modern world."

"Couples are much more involved in childbirth than ever before. Both parties are wanting to be part of the whole experience," she says. "Couples ... are coming to this [brit milah] with more understanding and more commitment to doing it."

Rosenkrantz was brought up in the Reform movement in Hamilton and has maintained that affiliation in Ottawa.

The Reform movement has been in the forefront of "gender equity" in Judaism, she says, noting that that there is nothing halachically wrong with a woman being a mohel.

She points out that Tzippora, Moses' wife, was in fact, the first female mohel – Tzippora "circumcised Moses' son to avoid the wrath of God."

After 5,000 years, however, there are only 25 woman in North America certified as mohels, three of whom reside in Canada.

Rosenkrantz says she meets with the parents prior to the event to get to know them and to explain to them both the medical procedure and the rituals they can expect.

She says she must also satisfy herself that the parents intend to bring up their child as a Jew, with all that the commitment entails, because the brit milah is far more than merely a surgical procedure.

As part of the procedure she freezes the "tender area" to alleviate the baby's pain, she says.

She involves as many family members as possible in the ceremony, and in addition to the traditional godparents, she has people light candles which, she says, "represent the presence of the Divine."

She says that one grandparent might hold the baby for the circumcision and the other for the naming; one person may bless the wine, another the bread. She says she also provides an opportunity for the parents to say something,

She says being a mohel is an intensely personal and "very powerful experience" for her, one which she finds very spiritual. "I am on to something new and exciting."

Winnipeg CJA sets target at $3.25 M

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The Combined Jewish Appeal (CJA) has announced its new management team for the 1999-2000 (5760) campaign.

Campaign co-chairs are longtime community workers Peter Leipsic and Charles Shore, and Women's Campaign is being led by Sharon Wolchock, past president of the National Council of Jewish Women of Canada, and currently a vice-president of the Canadian Jewish Congress.

Committee members include Gail Asper, Sheldon Berney, Marjorie Blankstein, Bob Brown, Marsha Cowan, Larry Hurtig, Mel Lazareck, Sandra Secter and Bob Silver.

Jerry Koffman, CJA executive director says that this year, instead of a Super Sunday telethon, there will be a Super Week.

The campaign team is setting a financial goal of $3.25 million, a $190,000 increase over last year. By 2002, campaign leaders hope to raise its goal to $4 million.

"The annual campaign does well," Koffman says, "but we have a host of programming needs, such as ESL classes for new immigrants, that fall just outside our grasp."

Koffman emphasized the need for the CJA to communicate its activities with members of the Jewish community on an ongoing basis.

The organization has created Reshet Winnipeg (Network Winnipeg), a monthly e-mail newsletter, and in August, the first issue of Communnity Magazine is due to come out. The bi-annual publication will be distributed free to nearly 6,000 Jewish households in the city.

"We can't just go to people to ask for money. We have to make a compelling case. We have to keep people abreast of what is happening in our community and the Jewish world in general," says Koffman.

Grade 2 chess champion

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — An 8-year-old Winnipegger is the Canadian Grade 2 chess champion.

Justin Lasker, a student at the Board of Jewish Education's Shore Early Years School, won the title at the Canadian Chess Challenge tournament in Summerside, P.E.I. in late May. He won eight games out of nine over two days.

(The Grade 1 champion was Harris Kaufman of Toronto, grandson of Winnipeg Jewish community leaders and philanthropists David and Nora Kaufman.)

Lasker started playing chess competitively in kindergarten. His sister Erica, 9, also plays competitively, finishing fifth in the provincial championships in her age group.

In July, he is heading to Vancouver for another competition.

Scene in Ottawa

By G.K. SIMCOE

Last week Nova Scotians went to the polls and handed Russ MacLellan his premier "pink slip," opting to bring the provincial Tories back to power. The impact of the election result on all of the five parties in the House of Commons is significant. Naturally, they all try to spin the event to their advantage – at least, publicly.

The Liberals dismiss the result, referring to the frequent tendency of Canadians to split their federal and provincial votes. That is, back a Tory provincial government when the Liberals are in power federally. The problem with this theory is this: the split vote theory refers to voters in a given province hedging their bets by supporting one party federally and counterbalancing that support by backing another party on the provincial level.

In this election Nova Scotians simply confirmed their universal contempt for the Liberal party. In case Jean, Eddie and Alan J. have forgotten, not a single Liberal was elected in Canada's "Ocean Playground" in the last federal election.

The Tories crow that after an extended period of political exile, the voters have finally reconciled with their true partner. All is forgiven (or at least forgotten), happy days are here again and the pork-barrel politics reminiscent of the Buchanan era can resume.

Unfortunately, that tune is not to be found in the premier-elect's songbook. John Hamm is a physician in the modest and gentle style of "Mendel the country doctor." He offered voters no extravagant promises nor did he suggest the aggressive slash and burn approach of premiers Ralph Klein and Mike Harris. In truth, he probably has more in common with NDP Premier Roy Romanow than with any of his five fraternal Tory premiers.

For their part, the New Democrats are wildly scrambling around to salvage some consolation after suffering a humiliating failure to convert early polling leads into a historic first Maritime NDP government.

The charismatic NDP leader, Robert Chisholm presented a bold face and commented on the difficulty of breaking through the "entrenched" two-party dynamic. The fact remains that despite a 16-month political limbo that Nova Scotians had to endure, the New Democrats returned three fewer MLAs than in the previous election. That's a loss whichever way you spin the tale.

Jewish community thriving in Kitchener-Waterloo

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

KITCHENER-WATERLOO — If you're tired of gridlock in Toronto traffic and the high housing costs, and you seek a calmer small city way of life, officials of this community have the answer.

In an audacious recruiting drive, they want Jewish families to come to the twin cities of Kitchener-Waterloo because they have a well developed infrastructure, including one of the smallest Jewish communities in North America to have its own day school.

This modern version of a tale of two cities has a venerable, active Orthodox congregation in Kitchener, just a few minutes from the downtown core, and an active Reform congregation across the unmarked border in Waterloo.

Housing costs are $100,000 less for a new home, said Simon Adler, Congregation Beth Jacob president, a lawyer who was brought up in Toronto but moved here in 1976.

"There's no rush hour here," he added.

"It's a far superior place to raise a family," said Howard Budd, 53, who comes from a long line of Kitchener families, and who is active in support of both Jewish and non-Jewish causes.

A retirement residence, on a life lease basis, with 20 apartments and 12 nursing beds, is scheduled to be built above the shul's education wing, and though the project is in the early stages, according to Howard Rotberg, 48, a past shul president, it will end the long wait seniors now face in getting into a home for the aged with kosher meals in Hamilton or Toronto.

"We'll be able to look after our people from cradle to grave," he said. Born in Brantford, Rotberg has lived in Kitchener since 1978.

Kitchener needs physicians, especially cardio-physicians, who can take advantage of the superior medical facilities available, he said.

Steven Silver, the 36-year-old president of the day school, is realistic enough to know that the community can't enter into a job search for prospective residents, but being in Canada's technology triangle (Kitchener-Waterloo and Cambridge) he believes will open up jobs in the area.

According to Silver, it is possible to rent a three-bedroom house here for $800 a month.

The Beth Jacob day school, dedicated to the memory of Rabbi Shraga Phyvle Rosensweig, who served the community for 36 years, has 18 students from kindergarten to Grade 6, and six in the pre-kindergarten class.

"I love this place and its close-knit families," said New-York born Rabbi Nathan W. Langer, 43, who has two sons in the day school.

He took over at Beth Jacob 30 months ago, and has a history of being comfortable in smaller congregations, including B'nai Abraham in Winnipeg, just prior to this one.

His wife Marcia (they've been married for 22 years) teaches junior kindergarten at the day school.

"We're both committed to Canada now," said Marcia Langer.

"Living costs in Kitchener are 33 percent less for sure compared with Toronto," said Rabbi Langer

With a total of 200 to 300 families, including the unaffiliated Jews, Adler said the community has enjoyed modest growth.

In addition, it is home to about 500 Jewish students at the University of Waterloo and Wilfrid Laurier University, both in Waterloo.

But most Jewish newcomers to the community come for business, not academic reasons, Adler said.

Beth Jacob has a membership of 150 families, while Temple Shalom has a membership of 75 families.

"I enjoy the place. It's got a different pace," said Roz Adelberg , a longtime member of Temple Shalom.

The Reform congregation, with a religious school of 45 students, shares a building known as The Cedars with Westminster United Church.

"It's the only building planned to hold two different congregations from the ground up," said Ernest Ginsler, chair of the Cedars building committee.

The unusual two-congregation building probably resulted from a chat over a fence between two neighbors of different faiths but similar interests, Ginsler said.

Since it now rents the property, (to be applied to the purchase price), the temple will make a decision in about a year on whether to buy outright, Ginsler said. "We're starting to burst at the seams."

Beth Jacob is a modern Orthodox congregation situated in a handsome building, with women and men sitting apart, but with no mechitzah, said Adler. "We're a very tolerant community," he said.

The history of Beth Jacob is an interesting one. One noteworthy example is the fact that for years it had a woman shamas (sexton), Bessie Brown, who took over from her husband.

In a 25-year history of the congregation published in 1983, Eve Gordon, a daughter of one of the community's pioneers, writes of Brown: "Today some of the very children that she lovingly chased with her broom are now grown and administering the affairs of the synagogue."

The Beth Jacob day school students and the Temple Shalom students meet once a week.

One of the few unfederated communities in Canada, the Jewish community here sends all the money raised in its annual campaign to Israel.

The vitality and energy of its active 74-member seniors group is exemplified in the weekly dinners 13 members have had for 50 years, according to Joe Roseman, president.

The community is particularly active in interfaith activities, which culminate its Holocaust Education Week with a student seminar that attracts 600 students each year, said Paul Walman, vice-chair of the Ontario region, Canadian Jewish Congress.

"I think we're the only Holocaust committee that has on it a woman who was an actual liberator at Buchenwald," he said.

Holocaust and Hope now touring Israel

TORONTO — Thirteen students from across Canada, accompanied by two leaders, are now in the midst of the third annual Holocaust and Hope Student Tour to Israel, co-sponsored by the League for Human Rights of B'nai Brith Canada and Canadian Friends of Massuah.

The trips are designed to expose Canadian high school students to both Israel and the Holocaust in a meaningful manner, and to encourage their continuing participation in anti-racist activities on their return.

This year's group includes two Jewish students, Emily Krangle-Long of Whitehorse in the Yukon Territories and Aislin Walsh of Hunter River, P.E.I.

The students are recommended by their teachers, many of whom have participated in similar tours for educators, with the final selection made by a League committee. The leaders this year are Marni Silver, of B'nai Brith's Young Leadership Network, and Peter Brotherhood, a teacher at St. Mary's Secondary School in Cobourg, Ont. Brotherhood was also one of the leaders of the 1997 student tour and is a past participant in an educators' tour.

The League has been sponsoring biannual educators' tours to Israel and Poland for more than 10 years. Participating teachers have come from the public and Catholic school systems in all the Canadian provinces.

During their two-week stay in Israel, the student group is visiting the major tourist areas as well as selected Holocaust memorial institutions and is given an opportunity to spend time with teenagers. Their mission will conclude with a three-day stay at the Massuah Institute for the Study of the Holocaust, where they will take part in in-depth seminars on the history and aftermath of the Holocaust as well as meeting with survivors. They will also undertake a variety of hands-on projects to project their understanding and feelings of what they have learned.

The Massuah Institute was created in the 1960s as a living memorial to members of Zionist Youth Movements and other victims of the Holocaust. Its teaching methods have been disseminated to educators across Canada, the United States and Europe and its programs are offered in a variety of languages to accommodate immigrant students in Israel and visitors from abroad. More than 10,000 students and 2,500 members of the Israeli Defence Forces attend Massuah lectures each year.

This summer, Massuah is hosting teachers from the former Soviet Union, who will participate in a program designed specifically for them. Among other foreign visitors this year have been university students from the United States and delegates from Sweden and Finland who are designing Holocaust memorial programs in their own countries.

Massuah is also an official locale for the annual Yom Hashoah (Holocaust memorial) ceremonies. This year's remembrance, dedicated to the story of the Holocaust in Soviet Russia and to Jewish combat, was attended by over 6,000 people, including the current Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Barak.

Treatment of 13 Iranian Jews said to be improving

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The treatment of 13 Iranian Jews recently arrested on charges of espionage has improved, thanks in part to pressure exerted by Canada's Jewish community.

Apparently sensitive to foreign criticism, Iran has eased the lot of the incarcerated Jews from Shiran and Isfahan following rallies and prayer vigils throughout Canada and the rest of the world.

In Canada, demonstrations have taken place in Toronto, Montreal, Ottawa, Winnipeg and Vancouver.

Due to these worldwide protests, the imprisoned Jews now have access to their families as well as to Red Cross officials, said Bernie Farber, executive director of Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, in an interview last week.

Canadian Jewry, he said, took "a lead role" in protesting the imprisonment of the Jews, whom Iran accuses of spying for the "Zionist regime" and "world arrogance," the United States.

And since Canada, unlike the United States, has an embassy in Teheran, the Iranian capital, Canada remains a "key player" in efforts to free the captives, Farber added.

Foreign Affairs Minister Lloyd Axworthy has condemned Iran's action and called for a fair trial and humane treatment of the Jewish inmates.

However, he has yet to actually call for their release, said Les Scheininger, chair of Congress' public policy and international affairs committee.

"More can be done by Canada," he said.

Meanwhile, Moshe Ronen, Congress president, has asked for a meeting with Axworthy. He hopes that Canada will alter its position and ask for the unconditional release of the prisoners.

"These are trumped-up charges," he declared.

Last week, Ronen talked with Israeli Foreign Minister David Levy by phone for an update of the situation.

Ronen said that Iran may be responding to international appeals to resolve the matter. "But it's too early to be optimistic," he warned.

The recent unrest in Teheran – the most serious since the Islamic revolution in 1979 – has reportedly frozen the issue.

The demonstrations and counter-demonstrations have pushed the fate of the Jews off Iran's list of priorities, according to Sam Kermanian, secretary-general of the Iranian American Jewish Federation in Los Angeles.

"In a way, it's better that this case is out of the news," he was quoted as saying by the Jewish Telegraphic Agency.

Kermanian suggested that a low-profile approach may persuade Iran to settle it before it spins out of control.

Iran, with an estimated 25,000 to 35,000 Jews, is home to the largest Jewish community in the Middle East outside Israel.

Its Jewish population was about 100,000 before 1979.

According to the London-based Jewish Chronicle, at least 17 Jews, including community leaders, have been executed in the past two decades.

Iran broke diplomatic relations with Israel in the first weeks after the revolution, and has since become one of Israel's arch enemies.

Israel gets nuke-capable subs

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — A new era in Israeli naval capability was ushered in with the arrival of the first of three German-made submarines in Haifa.

The new Dolphin submarine is superior in speed and maneuverability to anything currently in Israel's naval arsenal, according to Israeli officials.

"It is a different kind of submarine from any I have known," the submarine's commander told Israel Army Radio.

Some reports indicate that the submarine has been modified to carry cruise missiles with nuclear warheads.

If Israel were attacked with unconventional weapons, the submarine would be unharmed and ready for retaliation, the reports said.

Israeli defence officials refused comment on the submarine's strategic capabilities.

For three decades, there have been reports that Israel possesses nuclear weapons. Israeli leaders have repeatedly refused direct statements on the subject, saying only that the Jewish state would not be the first nation to use nuclear weapons in the Middle East.

The submarine's capabilities have raised concerns among Israel's Arab neighbors.

The Dolphin and two other submarines that are expected to arrive later this year, Leviathan and Tekuma, were built at a cost of some $300 million apiece by Germany, which offered them to Israel in return for Israel complying with an international request not to respond to Iraqi Scud attacks on the Jewish state during the 1991 Gulf War.

En route to Israel, the Dolphin cruised past the site near the Greek island of Crete where the Dakar submarine was lost at sea during its maiden voyage 30 years ago.

Crew members on the Dolphin scattered 69 flowers, one for each of the deceased Dakar sailors.

"From the first time that they mentioned a beit din," Katz said, "I personally – and it's on record – wrote them a letter saying, look, this is a matter now before the secular courts. If it's decided that it doesn't belong in the secular courts, then we'll go to a beit din."

Levitts sued rabbis Yitzchok Kerzner, Mordechai Levin and Avrohom Lowinger for libel and slander, for inducing breach of contract, and for restraint of trade, following the refusal by the Kashruth Council of Toronto (COR) to allow the sale of Levitts fresh kosher meat in establishments under its supervision. (The company's deli products, however, are authorized to be sold in COR-supervised establishments.)

Because COR is unincorporated, it cannot be sued. Rabbi Kerzner is chair of the Rabbinical Vaad Hakashruth; Rabbi Levin, executive director of the Kashruth Council; and Rabbi Lowinger, chief mashgiach of the council.

According to the ruling, Levitts' claim, "although couched in property and civil rights terms ... is an attack on the shomer Shabbat and shchitahs chutz (ritual slaughtering from outside the community) policies" of the Kashruth Council."

The policies, as outlined in the ruling, refer respectively to a requirement adopted in the mid-1980s that applicants for COR certification must be shomer Shabbat; and to a practice of certifying ritual slaughterers only within one's own community.

Levitts has kosher certification from the Va'ad Ha'Ir of Montreal (MK) as well as the Orthodox Jewish Council Vaad Hakashrus (Star-K).

It is agreed that Levitts meats are kosher, according to the ruling. However, the products do not meet COR's standards of kashrut, which include the stipulation that the owners be Sabbath observant.

Both COR and MK have made exceptions under a grandfather clause for companies, like Levitts, that were already kosher under their supervision prior to the adoption of the Sabbath observance policy.

The strange case of the Levy fortune

One hundred and eighty years ago, Elazar and Shimon Levy, two impoverished peddlers from Baghdad who bought, sold and repaired old furniture and home furnishings, purchased a heavy jar made of clay from a woman living in a village near the Persian border.

By happenstance, the jar broke into pieces, disgorging a treasure trove of pearls, diamonds and other jewels.

The next day, in the Iraqi port of Basra, the Levys sold a few of the diamonds and bought two boat tickets for passage to Britain, leaving their families behind in Baghdad.

According to Meiri, they settled in London and opened a jewelry shop. The business was so successful that one of their precious stones was placed in a crown worn by Queen Victoria.

As they prospered, the Levys invested in real estate, both in London and in the countryside. Elazar Levy died in 1841, and his brother a few years later.

"Nobody knows how many children they left in Baghdad," said Meiri. His brother, Baruch, an Israeli journalist, has written of the Levys for the Tel Aviv daily Ma'ariv.

"Nor do we know how many children they had from their second marriages in London, and why their inheritance was not divided between the legal inheritors."

The case languished for several generations, but was reopened following the arrival of Iraqi Jews in Israel in the early 1950s. In general, they emigrated from Iraq without any of their assets, which were confiscated by the Iraqi government.

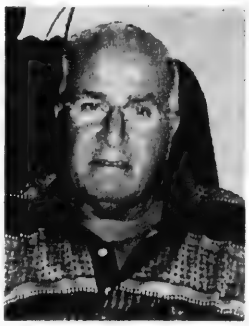
Sixteen years ago, the Levy claimants in Israel formed the Agga Levy Society to pursue their claims to the brothers' real estate fortune.

It is estimated to be worth in the vicinity of $1 billion today.

More concretely, the claimants hired a lawyer. Assisted by a British colleague, he collected facts and documents from Levy-related families in Israel and the Diaspora.

"Even the Israeli government took it seriously," said Meiri. "Prime Ministers Levi Eshkol and Golda Meir asked the Israeli embassy in London to help the lawyers."

Yet nothing came of these efforts, and the story was forgotten once again until it was revived by a young Jew who had escaped from Iraq, settled in Holland and promised his dying father that he would not rest until he found the treasure.



Aboud Sasson

"The young man started digging in every place that could lead him to discover any new sources of information," said Meiri. "He was lucky. He discovered that Elazar and Shimon had changed their names to Lawrence after immigrating to Britain."

This raises the question of whether the Levys are indeed related to Britain's royal family.

In the 18th century, a merchant from Venice, Zaccaria Levy, who may or may not have been an Iraqi Levy, settled in Britain. In 1826, his son, Joseph, changed the family name to Laurence. By the next generation, the family had abandoned Judaism and embraced Christianity.

Are the Levy's related to royalty?

On Dec. 12, 1992, Timothy Laurence, a direct descendant of the Levy clan, wed Princess Anne, Queen Elizabeth's daughter, in a Church of Scotland ceremony. She had been married to Mark Phillips.

Sasson is uncertain whether Timothy Laurence is, in fact, genetically related to Elazar and Shimon Levy. But he believes that a Levy is married to one of Queen Elizabeth's cousins.

Apart from having ascertained that the Levys anglicized their name, the young Iraqi Jew in Holland stumbled upon the will of one of the original Levy brothers. Attached to it was a list of their assets and the names of their heirs.

A claimant, Moshe Shahal, a minister who served under Yitzhak Rabin and Shimon Peres, went to London to substantiate the young man's findings.

"Shahal discovered that a lot of the assets were still registered in their names," said Meiri.

They include agricultural land in Kent and Devon counties and property in the centre of London.

By Meiri's estimation, no less than six lawyers, including Shahal, are currently working on the case.

It is, as may be imagined, enormously complex and riddled with conundrums.

"We traced five or six bank accounts of the Levy family," said Ofer Shahal, speaking on behalf of his father, who was away on a business trip. "We started a correspondence with the banks, but it led nowhere."

Sasson said that he is looking into the unexplained disappearance of a large sum of money in a Levy bank account.

"Someone took it. We don't know who. The account was worth 80,000 pounds sterling in the 1920s. Today it is valued at 80 million pounds."

Becker, a chemistry professor at Ben-Gurion University of the Negev, agreed that "there are some mysterious things going on, yet to be solved."

But he pointed to successes. "So far, we have been able to collect, quite successfully by ourselves, some very interesting documents and explore a few banks' accounts..."

Asked what the Agga Levy Society is contributing to the search for legitimate heirs, Sasson said it is drawing up a Levy family tree. "We want to make a connection between the Levy family in England and the Levys in Israel," he said.

Joseph Levy, the Iraqi-born proprietor of a Toronto dental supply company who can trace his ancestry back to the two brothers, has been embroiled in the case for more than four decades.

Levy, who immigrated to Canada in 1973 by way of Israel, said that his late father, Abdullah, told him about the inheritance in 1954.

He immediately hired a lawyer, a relative named Yitzhak Levy, but Levy came up short.

Three years ago, Levy retained the services of three lawyers to study the case, but there have been no breakthroughs. "We are continuing," he said with a tone of weary resignation.

The hunt for the lost inheritance has attracted the attention of the Babylonian Jewry Heritage Centre, based in Or Yehuda, Israel.

Zvi Yehuda, director of research, said that there have been no new developments of late.

"Nothing has happened."

"The problem is that no one takes this story seriously," sighed Baruch Meiri. "People are skeptical."

His brother, Avner, is not exactly holding his breath. "There are still a lot of obstacles to overcome before the inheritors can make their inheritance a reality."

The Week in Israel

July 26

• Foreign investments in Israel totalled $2.3 billion (US) during the past eight months, an increase of 44 percent over the previous 10 months.

July 27

• Prime Minister Ehud Barak and Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat held their second meeting to discuss implementation of the Wye Agreement. (PA officials subsequently stated they reject Barak's plan to link implementation of the Wye accords with the start of final status talks.)

July 28

• The Palestinian Authority asked Israel to help in its preparations for the Y2K computer bug. According to Ha'aretz, the Palestinians are particularly concerned that computer glitches could disrupt the functioning of hospitals.

• A military court sentenced a Palestinian, Salem Sansour, to three consecutive life terms for two 1998 attacks, in which a rabbi was stabbed to death in his home in Hebron and scores of others were injured.

July 29

• A Knesset vote to expand the size of the Cabinet was postponed after the speaker, Avraham Burg, received a report, which later proved to be false, that veteran legislator Amnon Rubinstein had died. Burg later reconvened the Knesset to announce that the report was false. The vote on the size of the Cabinet was rescheduled for the coming Sunday.

July 30

• Immigration to Israel in the first half of 1999 was up by 14 percent compared to the same period last year, mostly as a result of a dramatic leap of 130 percent in the number of new arrivals from Russia. Through to the end of June, 29,200 new immigrants have arrived from the former Soviet Union.

• Prime Minister Barak said in Alexandria, he was ready to implement the Wye accords as they are, if he could not persuade the Palestinians to change their approach.

Israel's Arab citizens

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Mideast Analysis

During the course of delivering the customary speech at the Knesset's opening session last month, President Ezer Weizman devoted a paragraph to Israel's Arab citizens. "...we must ...do everything to enable the attainment of full equality between the communities and their integration into the systems of the state," he declared.

Two days after his exhortation, a delegation of Israeli Arab members of parliament met with Weizman to register a protest. They claimed that Ehud Barak, the prime minister-elect, was disregarding Arab parties in the coalition negotiations. Barak, they told Weizman indignantly, had neither invited Arab parties to join his government, nor offered an Arab a place in his cabinet.

Before forming a government, Barak met with representatives from the Arab parties, United Arab List, Balad and Hadash, which won a total of 10 seats in the May 17 election. And while he reiterated his commitment to "peace and equality," and promised them that he would channel more funds to the Arab sector, he did not offer them a cabinet position.

Bitterly disappointed, particularly in light of the fact that 94 percent of Israeli Arabs voted for Barak as opposed to Benjamin Netanyahu, Israeli Arabs staged a demonstration outside the Knesset a day after he was sworn in as prime minister.

More in sorrow than anger, one Arab member of parliament, Abdel Wahhab Darawasha, accused Barak of being unable to break a psychological taboo and bring Israel's one million Arabs, a loyal minority comprising 20 percent of its population, into the national consensus. Another Arab MK, Taleb Sanaa, was less diplomatic. "...we thought we would be part of the political map, join the government and have an influence," he said. "But now we are being pushed to the margins."

For all the acrimony the issue aroused in the Arab community, Barak's failure to appoint an Arab minister was in line with Jewish public opinion. According to a survey conducted by Tel Aviv University's pollster, Tamar Hermann, 52 percent of Jewish respondents objected to an Arab minister, while 40 percent were in favor. Almost eight percent of the respondents had no opinion on the subject.

From the vantage point of Israeli democracy, Barak's decision was certainly a great disappointment. Israeli Arabs have been appointed to important jobs in the past. An Arab deputy minister has sat in the cabinet, and presently, Israel has an Arab ambassador and an Arab Supreme Court judge. Full cabinet membership, however, is still closed to Israeli Arabs, at least for now.

But in a related development, there has been a significant breakthrough which expands the civic rights and responsibilities of Israeli Arabs. On July 20, with Barak's consent, three Israeli Arab MKs – Hashem Mahameed (United Arab List), Sallah Tarif (One Israel) and Ayoub Kara (Likud) – were, for the first time, permitted to join the Knesset's foreign affairs and defence committee.

Justice Minister Yossi Beilin described the appointments as "a historic moment and another step towards turning Israeli Arabs into a legitimate component in the fabric of Israeli society."

Yet much more remains to be done, as Israeli Arab MK and prime ministerial candidate, Azmi Bishara, reminded voters during last May's election campaign. Due to the security situation, Israeli Arabs are still second class citizens, denied their fair share of municipal allocations and of senior posts in the civil service and in major state corporations.

Yet there has been progress. Before 1966, Arab villages were under military rule and Israeli Arabs' freedom of movement was restricted. They have come a long way in the past three decades, but for some Israeli Arab leaders, like Bishara, this has not been enough. He has proposed that Israel should be a "state of its citizens" rather than a Jewish state. The message is bold, but hardly any Israeli Jews are ready for such a revolutionary transformation.

Surgeon lengthens limbs

By MIRIAM CHINSKY
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Dror Paley, an orthopedic surgeon born in Israel and raised in Ottawa, is doing precisely what he wants, using his skill in limb lengthening and reconstruction to make a profound difference in the lives of many of his patients, children and adults, who hail him as a miracle worker.

One of his patients, Jordan Eppel was born with one leg shorter than the other. To compensate, he wore a built-up shoe until he was almost 11. Then, his parents began looking for a better solution to the problem.

Discovering Paley through the Internet, they brought their son to him for assessment, but agonized several weeks trying to decide whether the 2½-inch discrepancy really justified the radical surgery, adjustment, monitoring and therapy that were recommended.

Dr. Dror Paley

They opted to go ahead only when a 37-year-old former patient of Paley told Jordan, "It will be worth it all your life!"

A University of Toronto graduate, Paley completed his surgical internship at Johns Hopkins Hospital in Baltimore, returning to Toronto for his orthopedic residency.

As well, he sub-specialized in hand surgery at Sunnybrook Hospital, and pediatric orthopedics at the Hospital for Sick Children.

His interest in limb lengthening was sparked at a conference in 1983 when a visiting Italian surgeon, Dr. Renato Bobelli, introduced the Toronto audience to a revolutionary method for equalizing and restructuring abnormally short, deformed or diseased limbs.

Developed in western Siberia in the 1950s by a Russian Jewish physician, Dr. Gavriel Abramovitch Ilizarov, the procedure involved surgically dividing the bone through a very small incision, and anchoring the two segments with fine wire or screwlike pins to the "Ilizarov frame," an external fixator. This allowed new growth of bone and soft tissue in the gap as the appliance was very gradually pulled apart.

Intrigued, Paley who already understood English, Hebrew, French and Spanish, began studying Italian and Russian in order to learn the techniques of the Russians and Italians. Because the procedure originated in the Soviet Union during the years of isolation, it was not widely known outside that area.

In 1985, withdrawing their entire savings, Paley took his pregnant wife, Torontonian Wendy Schelew and their young son, to Italy, where he spent four months studying with doctors in Lecco. "I was young and eager to take a chance," he says.

From Italy, he was determined to go to the source, and the family set out for the Soviet Union.

Ilizarov, the son of poor parents, had started as a shepherd boy, but his brilliance and drive, and according to Paley, "fine medical education, one good aspect of the social system," gave him the tools for the innovative orthopedic research which was his strength, although he was a general practitioner.

Paley studied with Ilizarov for three months before coming back to Toronto.

The Hospital for Sick Children invested in the costly equipment needed, and Paley was able to train two other surgeons in the Ilizarov method. He makes it clear that he very much wanted to stay in Toronto to focus on the limb surgery and followup, but when a job was not available, he decided to investigate opportunities in the United States. This, he notes, was in 1986, before the brain drain to the United States. (Within two or three years, the surgeons he had trained left the country.)

Paley contacted Johns Hopkins, but there was nothing in his chosen field. However, his application was forwarded to the University of Maryland and he received a call offering him a job.

Today, Paley is director at the Maryland Centre for Limb Lengthening and Reconstruction which is affiliated with the University of Maryland. He is also professor of Orthopedic surgery and chief of Pediatric Orthopedics at the university.

Since 1987, over 3,000 limb lengthening surgeries have been performed at the centre on patients from 49 U.S. states and 35 countries around the world including Canada. Paley and his colleagues, Dr. John Herzenberg and Dr. Kevin Tetsworth also train physicians from numerous countries.

Paley affirms that other orthopedic surgeons in the United States now perform limb-lengthening surgeries but says that no other centres in the country specialize in the technique. He has travelled to such diverse areas as Nepal, Australia, Turkey, Israel, six Arab countries some 40 locations in all, to lecture and teach.

In 1992, he received a call from a Saudi Arabian representative in Washington who asked if he would be willing to go to Saudi Arabia to perform surgery on the young daughter of a prince. He said that he would only operate if the girl could be brought to Baltimore where he had the equipment and staff.

Before deciding, the caller, who had also contacted Ilizarov, asked, "By the way, what religion are you?"

"The same as Dr. Ilizarov," Paley replied.

"What's that?"

"Jewish."

There was a brief silence at the other end of the line, but then arrangements were made and the Saudi patient was brought to Baltimore. She underwent successful surgery and when she was recovering, the Paleys invited the Saudi entourage to their home for a barbecue. Later, the Paleys were invited to visit with the Saudis at their palace in Riyadh. Paley has since lectured in Saudi Arabia.

Celebrate Jewish holidays

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

A lot of books about the Jewish holidays, especially ones written for kids, are really very boring. Well, now there is a new one, that you will enjoy very much.

The book is called Celebrate! Stories of the Jewish Holidays, by Gilda Berger (Scholastic Press, 1998). Each chapter is a different major holy day: Shabbat, Rosh Hashanah, Yom Kippur, Sukkot, Chanukah, Purim, Pesach and Shavuot.

Berger tells, in her own words, stories that have something to do with each holiday. For instance, the chapter about Shabbat tells the story of how God created the world.

An appealing parable added by Berger (a parable is a little story that is meant to help you understand the main point a little better) is about the Spirit of Shabbat coming to God, and complaining that everything else had been created in pairs. Only it was created single.

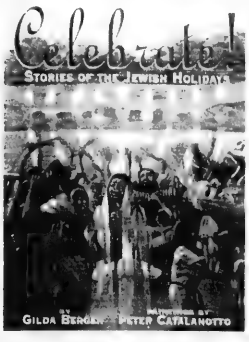
God answered that one day each week the children of Israel would welcome Shabbat like a bride, and that it would give them "a foretaste of the peace and glory of the world to come."

Other stories are Jonah and the whale, for Yom Kippur; the story of Esther for Purim; and Abraham being told to sacrifice his son, Isaac, to God, which is read from the Torah on Rosh Hashanah.

After the story, you will find information about the holiday and about how we celebrate it, crafts, and recipes that are easy enough for kids to make (some need an adult's help) but sound really tasty.

I would like to try the Shabbat kugel, with noodles, sugar, eggs, cinnamon, apples, raisins and orange and lemon juices; the Sukkot vegetable casserole, with onion, mushrooms, rice, sweet potato, broccoli and cheddar cheese, and hamantaschen on Purim.

Since Rosh Hashanah is coming up in early September, you might like to make the greeting cards that the book describes. During the year, you can make a gragger for Purim, or a dreidel for Chanukah.



Peter Catalanotto drew wonderful paintings to go with each chapter, using dramatic colors and interesting details.

Another interesting thing in the book is a sort of calendar, that shows when the stories happened in relationship to each other.

MI MAKIR: A SEARCH FOR THE MISSING

Montreal artist Yehouda Chaki's exhibit brings his unique collection of books and portraits to the Robert McLaughlin Gallery at the Civic Centre, 72 Queen St., Oshawa, Ont., Aug. 5 to Oct. 17. The title, Mi Makir, Hebrew for "Who knows," comes from the radio announcement played often in Israel after the World War II: "The Department for the Search for Missing Relatives asks who knows and who is informed," where lists of missing people were read out in the hope a listener could supply information. The installation of books and portraits refers to the Holocaust and the artist's sense of loss. For more information call 905-576-3000.

Brooks to direct Endgame at Harbourfront

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Soulpepper Theatre Company is presenting Irish playwright Samuel Beckett's 1954 classic, Endgame from July 22 to Aug. 28 at Harbourfront Centre, with director Daniel Brooks at the helm.

Brooks, a native North Yorker, began his university studies majoring in science. "I was an unhappy boy. So, I went travelling to Europe and Israel for a year, spending four months on a kibbutz, where I wrote a lot. When I came back, a friend suggested I take a look at University of Toronto's undergraduate theatre program."

During the university's summer breaks, Brooks and fellow students including Leah Cherniak, co-founder of Theatre Columbus, and actress Mary Ellen Mahonney, formed a theatre company. After graduating in 1981, Brooks continued his thespian studies at New York's famed Circle On The Square.

"I did a lot of acting during my first 10 years out of school. I did a one man show. I toured South America with it, and everywhere I went, I took various classes in theatre, dance and clowning," Brooks says.

"All along, I was developing my understanding of theatre. Underneath, I think I always wanted to direct. About nine years ago, I stopped acting except in my own work, because I found myself having what I thought were stronger ideas than the directors I was working with. Maybe I'm a control freak or maybe I had some kind of theatrical vision that I wanted to explore."

Realizing this new direction, Brooks joined forces with Tracy Wright and Don McKellar, and formed the Augusta Company. Brooks also co-created and performed in a theatrical Passover seder called the Theory of Relatives, produced four years ago at Toronto's Tarragon Theatre.

The director has collaborated with Guillermo Verdecchia on a number of productions including the award winning Insomnia, and with Daniel MacIvor on House and The Soldier's Dreams, which both won Brooks a Dora Award For Best Direction.

Brooks also won the 1997 Chalmers New Canadian Play Award and the Pauline McGibbon Award, given every three years to an emerging director.

"This award meant the most to me because it is a recognition of a body of work, rather than the idiosyncratic acknowledgment of one play over another. [That] doesn't really mean too much to me because once you begin to judge a work of art in terms of being better than another, you are already taking it in the wrong way," Brooks said.

"I think theatre, in particular, is a creative medium and there are a number of ways to give recognition. Parties are a more interesting celebration of a theatre community than an award ceremony, which I feel are pretty arbitrary and much more about interpersonal relationships than art."

Soulpepper Theatre Company, consisting of 12 of Canada's leading artists, was created last year in order to present classical masterworks. Brooks will be directing a cast of four including Peter Donat and Diego Matamoros, who enlisted the director for this production.

Brooks says, "I've known Diego Matamoros for years, he suggested Endgame because he had an instinct the play would be right up my alley, as it were. When I reread the play, after a number of years, I realized how deeply influenced I had been by it."

Beckett originally wrote Endgame in French, while living in Paris. Brooks describes it as unique, with an incredibly refined vision of suffering. "It's one of the most impressive and influential plays of the 20th century. It doesn't really reveal its story, it just happens. The audience is almost like a fly on the wall. The writing is extraordinary in its simplicity, directness, sound of the phrases and what it expects."

After Endgame and a summer camping trip with partner Jennifer Ross and their two daughters, Emma 7 and Kate 2, Brooks will be dividing his time between Augusta Company and his other theatrical endeavor, Da Da Kamera – that tours internationally.

"I often ask myself why I got into this profession. Sometimes it gets really hard. It's very personal, with great amount of pressure because a lot is on the line. The potential for failure is very public. It can be hard to make good art and in terms of that, I'm ambitious about making something that is worthy."

For tickets to Soulpepper Theatre Company's Endgame call the Harbourfront Box Office at 973-4000. Tickets cost $20-$46.

MIRVISHES BRINGING BROADWAY'S CABARET

Toronto theatre entrepreneurs David and Ed Mirvish, proprietors of the Princess of Wales Theatre, are bringing an acclaimed Broadway production of the stage musical Cabaret to Toronto Sept. 8 to Oct. 16.

The production, which focuses on the decadent glamor of Berlin's Kit Kat Klub in the 1930s, won four Tony Awards last year, including one for Best Revival. It is based on characters found in Berlin Stories, which British writer Christopher Isherwood published 60 years ago in 1939. Material from the stories was later shaped into the film I Am A Camera (1955) and the 1972 cinematic classic Cabaret.

Directed by Sam Mendes, the new musical incorporates songs from the Kander/Ebb soundtrack of Cabaret that were not part of any previous stage version. It is supposedly much more gritty ("real, rough and raw") than previous productions — the figures onstage are "garish, ghoulish and aggressively arresting," said the New Yorker.

It has played continuously to sold-out houses in New York since its opening last year.

The Toronto cast features Joely Fisher as Sally Bowles; she is the daughter of Connie Stevens and Eddie Fisher. Norbert Leo Butz plays the emcee, and Rick Holmes plays the role of Cliff.

More from Interwar Berlin: The legendary Comedian Harmonists, the once-popular Berlin group that was the subject of a film at the last Toronto Jewish Film Festival, are again the object of attention.

Joe Boyd, a longtime devotee of the group, has produced a remastered album of the band's music, and after 20 years is preparing to release it as a CD on the Hannibal label.

In the late 1920s, the band's amazing arrangements of standards such as Night & Day, The Last Roundup, Tea For Two and Duke Ellington's Creole Love Call thrilled audiences around the world.

The Brooklyn-based Boyd describes the Comedian Harmonists' arrangements as "the Mills Brothers meets Spike Jones."

"They have to be heard to be believed," he said. "This timeless music has long been a treasured secret of collectors. In Germany the recordings have never stopped selling."

Since some of its six members were Jewish, the band was eventually silenced by the Nazis.

The CD is being released as part of the EMI Electrola archive.

Looted Painting Returned: The Seattle Art Museum has done the decent thing and returned a Henri Matisse painting to descendants of its original owner. The Nazis confiscated it during WWII.

Painted in 1927, Matisse's Odalisque was donated to the museum by two west-coast collectors who purchased the painting from a New York gallery in 1954. It had previously belonged to a Mr. Rosenberg, a Jewish art dealer in France, whose heirs discovered the whereabouts of the painting from a book.

Accomplished with the assistance of the American B'nai Brith, the restitution marks the first time that a US museum has returned an artwork looted by the Nazis to its rightful owner. The process, which involved a long investigation, took more than two years.

"We said we would do the right thing and hopefully people agree that that's what we've done," said museum director Mimi Gates. "We regret that it took so long (but) if we were going to be responsible, we didn't have any alternative."

Poet confronts difficult realities

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

In Why Poems Should Not Be Fictions, one of the pieces in Libby Scheier's Kaddish For My Father: New and Selected Poems, 1970-1999 (ECW Press), the Toronto poet seems to imply that there's already too much artifice in the world and that the poet should perform her art unmasked, without resorting to a narrative disguise.

Although at times resembling novelistic prose, Scheier's poetry seems intensely autobiographical, more like a personal diary than fiction. Whether this is an illusion is immaterial: with Kaddish For My Father, we are lowered into a seething inferno of words that seems, on the surface, to be a no-holds-barred emotional journal that the poet kept of her father's illness and death from 1995 to 1997.

Unhealed memories parade through these pages like so many Banquo's ghosts. Scheier describes a difficult, abusive, bullying father, still intimidating even though frail and dying, with whom she is desperately seeking an elusive peace.

The reader does not long remain a stranger: quickly we are brought into the solipsistic circle of the poet's grief, which seems as angry and troubled as the storm clouds that sometimes threaten her city. We become privy to recollections of a childhood sexual assault, fantasies of fraternal incest, and to repeated descriptions of her rage against her father and the tortuous Oedipal posturings of family members around him as he lay dying.

Light equals spirit

An intensely physical poet, Scheier does not shy away from confronting difficult realities; no one could accuse her of being demure. If she owes much to Allen Ginsberg's poetic Kaddish of the 1950s in which he detailed his mother's descent into madness, she also boasts a Ginsberg-like fascination with body parts and functions, especially sexual. She steps gingerly into the sensual garden of Sappho.

Counterbalancing the acute physicality is an intense spirituality that is manifested through her repeated consultation of the sky above her Harbourfront home. Light equals spirit in the calculus of these poems, and Scheier is constantly divining the heavens as if redemption might arrive along with the purity of a sunrise or the brilliant transparency of the morning air.

Religious imagery also runs through many of the roughly 36 poems in this non-traditional Kaddish. Scheier evidently seeks redemption in her Jewish roots – or, at least, in her revisionist brand of Judaism in which women don phylacteries.

The poet struggles to reconcile herself to her Jewishness, as she does with the fact that she is and will always be her father's daughter. He is, she says, the "yud of my heart," a pun that underlies the meaning of her mourning cycle of poetry. A yud is a Jew; it is also the 10th letter of the Hebrew alphabet and the first letter of the Holy Name, and thus an essential doorway to spirituality and self-fulfillment.

In an early poem, Wheelchair, 1, which is typical for its shocking honesty, Scheier writes of "how simple it would be to just tip the chair and watch him tumble down a steep ravine, never to hurt anyone again." But she knows she cannot.

She confronts the painful, universal conundrum of childhood anger with bravery and uncommon literary skill.

Sometimes her free verse is elevating, but more usually it is degraded and undisciplined, like most modern poetry. Since her best pieces are prose, she might do well to attempt a novel, even if it means donning the fictional mask. More joy and a lot less anger would definitely round out her artistic palette.

A treasure trove of history

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

Malta would be worth trillions, if being rich in history could be counted in coins. The population of 380,000 can trace its origins back to 4000 BCE.

Malta consists of five islands – Malta, Gozo, Comino and two uninhabited islands – which are approximately 200 square miles in total. Situated at the crossroads of the Mediterranean Sea, the Maltese islands are about 60 miles from Sicily and 180 miles from Tunisia.

Marasaxlokk

Historically, control over Malta was a prerequisite for domination of the Mediterranean. Malta's colonizers included the Phoenicians, Carthaginians, Romans, Byzantines, Arabs, Normans, Castilians, Knights of St. John, the French and finally the British.

Malta gained its independence from Britain in 1964 and became a republic a decade later.

Apart from the beautiful beaches, tourists can also visit the many historical sites.

The Maltese owe their Catholic faith to Paul the Apostle – he was shipwrecked on Malta's shores in 60 CE. They speak a Semitic language which is similar to Arabic, but it has a hint of Romance.

Much of the culture is rooted in era of the Knights of the Order of St. John, who ruled the islands from 1530 until Napoleon conquered them in 1798.

The origins of the Knights of the Order of St. John date back to the 11th century. They were Christian pilgrims who were expelled from Jerusalem and later from Rhodes. Emperor Charles V gave Malta to the knights in 1530 and they quickly improved trade and commerce on the islands.

The Turkish leader Suleiman wanted to destroy the order and to use Malta as a base to attack southern Europe and so he invaded the islands. The Great Siege of 1565 lasted four months, and although heavily outnumbered, the knights, assisted by the people of Malta, defeated the Turks.

After their victory, the knights ushered in a golden era of culture, architecture and arts. The castles and wall fortifications found today in Malta are vestiges of this era.

Up until the siege the medieval city of Mdina served as Malta's capital. Under the rule of the Grand Master Jean Parisot de la Valette, who thwarted the Turks, a new fortified city was built and named Valletta in his honor.

The knights originated from Europe's richest families, and Valletta, which overlooks the Grand Harbor, reaped the benefits of this wealth.

During World War II, the islands served as a strategic base for the Allied invasion of Sicily.

The Maltese weathered horrendous aerial attacks and were honored for their valor in 1943. They received a plaque from U.S. President Franklin Delano Roosevelt and the prestigious George Cross from England's King George VI.

A great way to learn about Malta is to check out the audiovisual show, Malta Experience, in Valletta. After the movie, visit St. John's Co-Cathedral, formerly the conventual church of the order, and the Grand Master's Palace, which now houses Malta's Parliament and the armory.

From the Upper Barracca Gardens, formerly the private gardens of the Italian knights, one can see across the Grand Harbor to the fortified towns of Vittoriosa, Cospicua and Senglea, commonly referred to as the Three Cities.

The Wartime Experience, housing the George Cross in its lobby, the National War Museum in St. Elmo, and the Lascaras War Rooms, where U.S. General Dwight Eisenhower and British Lord Mountbatten devised their combat strategies during Word War II, are a must for history aficionados.

Nicknamed the Silent City, Mdina, with its winding streets, offers visitors the multi-visual, Mdina Experience. Not to be missed is The Knights of Malta – a recreation of history through the use of 120 life-size characters, dressed in period costumes and set in historical chambers.

Other places of interest include the Maritime Museum in Fort St. Angelo, the quaint island of Gozo's Citadel and its museums, the Ggantija Prehistoric Temples and picturesque Marsaxlokk – a fishing village in Malta's south where Turkish forces landed and the knights surrendered to Napoleon.

Maltese and English are Malta's official languages. Accommodations are plentiful and the average temperatures range from 13 C in the winter to 30 C in the summer.

Canadian Airlines and British Airways connect with Air Malta at London's Heathrow Airport – Terminal 4. One Malta lira costs approximately $3.90. For more information contact, Malta National Tourist Office, New York at 212-695-9520.

Neolithic temples predate Stonehenge.

The Maltese countryside.

Fishermen still use the dghajsa, as their forefathers did.

The war museum in Valletta. Turkey seiged the island in 1565. In 1943 the Maltese were honored for withstanding three years of German bombing.

The Citadel in Victoria, Gozo, was built by the knights of Malta.

Business Profile

Retail whiz makes life easier for pharmacists

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Time was when "druggists," as they used to be called, had to be as adept at mixing up a decent chocolate shake as at preparing a batch of antibiotics.

Pharmacists of yesteryear had to do it all, from sweeping floors, preparing prescriptions (sometimes using mortar and pestle – remember those?) to staffing a lunch or soda fountain counter. Most pharmacists, especially those in small towns, were sole proprietors – merchants as well as health care professionals. The big chains, which assumed a large part of the average practitioner's workload, did not flourish until the 1950s.

That doesn't mean life for pharmacists has become easier. If anything, the job is even more demanding, given the arrival of new, more complex drugs on the market, and the endless ways one drug can interact with any other. The person behind the counter has a lot to worry about when it comes to delivering front-line health care; whether there are enough detergents or cosmetics on the shelves can only be a distraction.

Enter Drug Trading Co. Ltd., and its energetic president and CEO, Larry Latowsky. Headquartered in Toronto, Drug Trading is Canada's largest retail organization and the country's leading pharmaceutical dispenser. What that means for the average, overworked, independent pharmacist is this: The company provides complete retail, professional, technical, marketing and other services, freeing practitioners to focus on their job's enormous health-related responsibilities.

"We act on behalf of 1,500 independent pharmacists across Canada," says Latowsky, a 19-year retail veteran who was appointed to the top job at Drug Trading last October. "We are in the business of providing solutions."

Essentially, the company is a one-stop centre, functioning much like a co-operative, but perhaps a bit more aggressively. Those who join pay a membership fee (anywhere from $3,000 to $7,500 a year). Drug Trading requires the purchase of a core amount of services.

In return, the independent pharmacist has a load taken off his or her shoulders. The company offers a full range of retail services to pharmacies operating under four national banners: IDA, Guardian, RxCentral and Community Drug Mart, as well as to independent, non-banner stores.

Drug Trading negotiates with over 1,000 different vendors whose wares are sold in pharmacies, whether soft drinks, potato chips or diapers, and is able to get its members chain-like costs. It also goes to bat for pharmacists on issues of legislation and professional concerns; it helps with merchandising problems; it provides nearly 100 million pieces of advertising and marketing materials a year; and through a 10-year agreement signed in 1997 with Medis Health and Pharmaceutical Services Inc., it provides wholesale distribution services of drugs and pharmaceutical supplies to its members.

Larry Latowsky, president and CEO of Drug Trading Co. Ltd.

"Whether it's dispensing or point of sale or operational services of product pricing signs, we do it," says Latowsky.

The numbers tell the story: Last year, Drug Trading members filled over 41 million prescriptions, more than any other drug store organization in Canada, and rang up about $3 billion in sales. In the first four months of 1999, sales were up 11 percent, and in a 45-day period this past spring, 40 independent pharmacies converted to either IDA or Guardian banners.

As Latowsky understates, "Pharmacy is a good business."

So good, in fact, that Latowsky is now offering what the company calls a new "repositioning" program, the final element in its two-year plan. "Pharmacy 2000" is designed to maximize members' collective purchasing power (leading, it is hoped, to lower costs for consumers), while preserving a drug store's small-town approach to personalized service. The company describes it as a "holistic" new tack that will harmonize every aspect of drug store operations, from the dispensary through to the impulse-driven front of the shop. A key to the program will be the launch of PharmAssist, a new marketing program that will link all four banner stores' dispensary services, technology and consumer-focused programs.

Among the new initiatives Latowsky envisions are more in-store clinic days, professional development opportunities and better patient information.

The company also plans to expand its dispensary software system, known as Nexxsys, to provide total patient care, from tracking prescriptions and refills, to providing the customer with information on dosage and possible interactions with other drugs.

Apotex, Canada's largest pharmaceutical company, has recently teamed up with Drug Trading to form a program that will provide members with a one-stop inventory of medications available in any dispensary.

A multi-million-dollar advertising campaign that will emphasize a pharmacist's partnership with the patient will kick it all off this autumn. It's the boss's intent to have 2,000 stores join the new program, not as another millennium kicker, but as a realistic goal.

Behind the breakneck speed at which Drug Trading is moving is Latowsky, who is described in the retail business as a turnaround specialist. His mission has been to lead the company's transformation from a wholesale distributor to a retail services company. The firm employs 200. Most – 1,100 – of its member pharmacies are in Ontario, with the rest in Western Canada (275) and the Maritimes (125). About 200 members are in rural areas, "and in many centres, they are the only provider of service," Latowsky says. There are no Drug Trading affiliates in Quebec, "but we're looking into that."

Adding to his full plate is the fact that regulations governing pharmacists vary from province to province. "We represent our members, no matter where they are."

Latowsky, 39, who makes his home in Thornhill with his wife, Karen, and two young daughters, got his start with what he calls a kitchen-table degree in pharmacy, courtesy of his father Norman, once an independent pharmacist who went on to become president of Top Drug Mart and chair of United Cigar Stores.

After graduating from York University, the younger Latowsky quickly racked up a record of fast start-ups and turnarounds. As president and CEO of Toronto-based Drug World Ltd., from 1983 to 1990, he is credited with expanding the business from one store to 10. He then orchestrated a merger with BiWay, an affiliate, to leverage the assets of both businesses.

As a senior executive at BiWay from 1990 to 1996, he helped guide the company through its $30-million turnaround. As president of Bargain Shops, a national, 200-store chain, he led the business from a negative to a positive return on investments in two years.

Last fall, Latowsky joined a company that was founded in 1905 with a mandate "to support and service independent pharmacy." In 1933, Drug Trading established Independent Druggists' Alliance (IDA), now the oldest pharmacy chain in Ontario. Guardian Drugs was born in 1964.

Despite growth and successes over the decades, Drug Trading faced losses of $8 million in 1996, and embarked on an extensive restructuring effort from wholesale distribution to retail service provision. It sold its wholesale assets to Medis Health (with which it has its distribution deal) and closed its Scarborough distribution centre.

The company is now enjoying stability and growth, and has grand plans for the future. Stores will be redesigned to accentuate the dispensary without detracting from other areas. To date, the company has entered into new arrangements with 120 suppliers, including exclusive deals with Hallmark and Coca-Cola.

Like the old-fashioned, white-smocked druggist of yore, Latowsky lives by a simple professional creed: "To fairly promise and to over-deliver. So far, I think it's worked."

Female rabbi loves to watch the ponies run

By HARLAN ABBEY
Special to The CJN

BUFFALO — The Triple Crown attracts hundreds of thousands of horse racing fans from all walks of life, but Audrey Korotkin is probably one of the few rabbis among them.

Or if not, certainly the only rabbi who knows nearly all the trainers, jockeys and owners by their first names.

Rabbi Korotkin, who was ordained recently at the Hebrew Union College's (HUC) Cincinnati campus, formerly served as executive director of Triple Crown Productions, which coordinated coverage of the Kentucky Derby, the Preakness and the Belmont Stakes.

Prior to that, she won racing journalism's Eclipse Award, racing's equivalent of the Oscar, for her work as a radio journalist covering the sport in Baltimore.

There probably has never been a rabbi with such an unusual background.

"Blame it on my grandparents," joked Rabbi Korotkin, who is married to Don Clippinger, editor of Thoroughbred Times, a weekly racing magazine based in Louisville, Ky.

A native of the Washington, D.C. area, Audrey would visit her grandparents, Freda and the late Michell Korotkin, as a youngster.

"They loved racing," she said. "They took my father (Arthur) and my aunt Barbara to all the area race tracks and even drove to Kentucky to visit the famous breeding farms.

"I can remember going to the old Liberty Bell Park and my grandfather would hold the program up to me – I was only two or three at the time – and let me pick a horse for him to bet on.

"Of course, I couldn't even read yet, but they instilled in me a great love for the sport."

Rabbi Korotkin enrolled at the University of Maryland, majoring in Soviet and East European studies with a broadcasting minor, with ambitions of becoming a foreign correspondent.

"When I went to work for WBAL radio in Baltimore, I found I liked covering local news," she related.

"Racing is the number three industry in Maryland and the news director told me to learn everything I could about the sport.

"That was in 1979, the year of Spectacular Bid. I loved the human interest stories and the people in racing. My family was very supportive of my work in journalism and enjoyed hearing me on the radio.

"I met my husband through racing," Rabbi Korotkin continued. "We were introduced by a mutual racing-writer friend at the Maryland Hunt Cup timber race in 1982.

"We were just acquaintances until five years later, when we ran into each other in Hialeah Park in Florida and started dating."

Looking back on her days as a racing reporter, Rabbi Korotkin remembers:

"My favorite horse is Creme Fraiche, trained by the late Woody Stephens and winner of the 1985 Belmont. Whenever I could, I'd go see him race. I always brought mints to him and I spent time with him in the barn.

Rabbi Audrey Korotkin

"He even got to recognize my voice and would start whinnying if he heard me at the other end of the barn.

"My second favorite horse was Easy Goer, whom I'd spotted on the training track at Saratoga before he ever started. He was really majestic looking and would show off for the backstretch crowds, posing for pictures like he was Secretariat.

"He wasn't, of course, but he did win the '89 Belmont – and broke my heart when he lost the Derby and Preakness."

Audrey and her husband gave up daily journalism and moved to Louisville where she began doing freelance publicity for area race tracks in addition to her Triple Crown Production duties.

"We were also doing some PR for non-profit agencies, but we both felt something was missing in our lives," Clippinger said.

"We joined Congregation Temple Shalom in Cincinnati and began studying with Rabbi Stanley Miles."

"It opened up a whole new world to me," Rabbi Korotkin continued. "I became active in the congregation's social action work, in the local Jewish federation and in its community relations council.

"After three or four years, I came to realize this is what I should be doing full-time."

Her first year of rabbinical studies (1994) at HUC's Israel campus, was a strain:

"Don and I were apart except for Chanukah and Passover. He was doing publicity for the Preakness – the first race I missed since 1979 – but he arranged for me to hear it on the telephone at midnight."

In addition to her studies, Rabbi Korotkin is the weekend rabbi at Anshe Emet in Piqua, Ohio, two hours away from their home in Fort Thomas, Ky., and 30 miles north of Dayton, Ohio.

"It's a very small congregation of 25 families, but I'm going to continue there while working toward my PhD in rabbinics and Talmud at HUC.

"It's nice for them and for me; they won't have to 'break in' a new rabbi each year."

Rabbi Korotkin, who used to have time to ride, is not sure what track to follow once her studies are completed.

"I've though about becoming a congregational rabbi, but I have four more years before I have to make that decision.

"Right now, I'm enjoying my studies and teaching some communications courses to my fellow rabbinical students.

"It's funny how life changes so dramatically in so short a time."

Rabbi Korotkin doesn't feel that her transition is any more unusual than other "non-traditional," older rabbinical classmates: lawyers, ad agency executives, government workers...

"I think as we get older, many of us find we need an outlet to fulfill our spiritual needs.

"Now, I'm invited into people's lives and families at the most joyful and also at the most painful of times," she said.

"It's a tremendous responsibility and also an incredible blessing."

The Inside Back

Red tape entangles Eliyahu

By JORDAN MAX

Mr. Eliyahu Hanavi,
c/o Messianic Era Developments Ltd,
Jerusalem

Dear Mr. Hanavi,

Thank you for submitting, or rather, announcing your proposal for a Third Temple, Beis HaMikdash Shlishi, a large synagogue-type development in the Jerusalem municipality. We are pleased that you have selected our city for this project. We have conducted a preliminary assessment of your project's feasibility, and note the following issues which must be satisfactorily addressed for municipal approval prior to construction.

Last Laugh

The proposed site, being the current Temple Mount, is zoned B-1 for a religious institution.

However, we understand that you also plan to conduct "animal sacrifices" (further explanation is required) and hold a court of Jewish law there, as well. Our religious affairs department informs us that this is quite unusual for a synagogue, and this would have to be reviewed carefully. We note that city bylaws prohibit bringing farm animals into the city proper.

Notwithstanding your claim that smoke will ascend directly upward, a noxious odor abatement plan will be required. Moreover, we note that this site is not zoned for an abattoir and open-air grill (we assume this is some type of restaurant), so a mixed-used designation would be required, which might require an amendment to the city's master plan. It may be more likely that Moshiach will come before the master plan can be amended. Alternative sites should be considered. Perhaps the Teddy Kollek Soccer Stadium can be retrofitted for your purposes.

You had stated that your Beis HaMikdash Shlishi concept will accomodate millions of persons on the three major pilgrimage holidays, hundreds of thousands on Shabbat, and thousands on a daily basis. We are doubful that the space available will adequately handle these large crowds, and current fire code regulations for occupancy will have to be strictly followed. As well, adequate parking has not been addressed in the development plans.

Use of this temple will likely generate considerable traffic and congestion, even if public transit is assumed to be available. We note that the space under the Temple Mount may be suitable for underground parking, however, local residents may not be in favor of such a large development and traffic volume.

We suggest that their input and agreement would be most helpful in the approval process. There are also day care centres, public washrooms, non-smoking areas, lighting, signage and conscientious objector (the "apikoros" by-law) requirements which must be satisfied.

Once these issues have been resolved, architectural plans and designs will have to be reviewed by a committee comprised of local councillors who will review the height, density, artistic and asthetic design, and may require significant alterations. To date, we have not received any specific model or drawings. Notwithstanding your claim that your client, God Himself will build the project, we would need to see the drawings and confirm his architect, contractor and subtrade qualifications and licences. The ministries of labor and interior will need to review the immigration and work permits of all construction workers. This being Israel, we also anticipate that construction will take considerably longer than a day, as you maintain, therefore arrangements will have to be made for local disruption during construction.

While we respect your opinion that the establishment of the Third Temple is solely in your client's hands, our legal department has determined that the municipality has jurisdiction for development before, during and even after the Messianic Era. In the event that your client acts unilaterally, we will immediately seek an injunction through the courts. This should be avoided at all costs by adhering to the municipality's approval process, which is expected to take four to five years.

Again, we thank you for considering building your project in Jerusalem and look forward to further discussions and refinements of this important project and tourist attraction.

Sincerely,
The Planning Commission,
City of Jerusalem

About Teens

Dear Karilani,

I thought all of my school problems would end with the start of summer. I was wrong. My report card is being mailed to my house. The problem arises in regards to my grades. I did not do well at all.

My parents are expecting B+'s and A's. I don't think they will be satisfied with the marks that I have. I knew of their expectations the whole year, and I lied to them to get them off of my case. I told them my marks were high. The difference is, what is good to me is not necessarily good to them.

I'm afraid of how they are going to react when they see my marks. I'm worried that they will punish me and take away my free time, and in turn, embarrass me in front of my friends. What should I do?

Worried

Dear Worried

First, you should not lie to your parents. However, because you have already lied, it is important to tell them the truth now. Once the report card comes, your parents will confront you anyway, so it is better if you admit to your mistake and approach them first.

When you speak to your parents, there are a variety of issues that must be discussed. Firstly, tell them that you lied about your marks during the year. Then tell them what marks you finished with, so that when the report card comes they will not be shocked.

Another issue that must be discussed is the differing level of expectations you and your parents have about your grades. If you feel you can't achieve A's and B+'s, then you must make this point very clear to your parents. Tell them why you feel these marks are unattainable. If they maintain the same expectations of you, you will have to work harder to achieve the higher grades.

The final issue is the punishment. First, see what it is before telling your parents how you feel about being embarrassed. If the punishment will embarrass you, explain this to your parents, and see if there's another way of dealing with your punishment.

Remember that this problem stemmed from your lies. Good communication with your parents is very important. Try not to scream. Speaking to them rationally will give them a greater insight into your life.

Karilani is a composite name for three girls, who are close friends and in Grade 11 in Toronto

Composer continues to bring fresh new sounds

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — After more than half a century, Milton Barnes, one of Canada's most prolific and eclectic composers, continues to explore new directions.

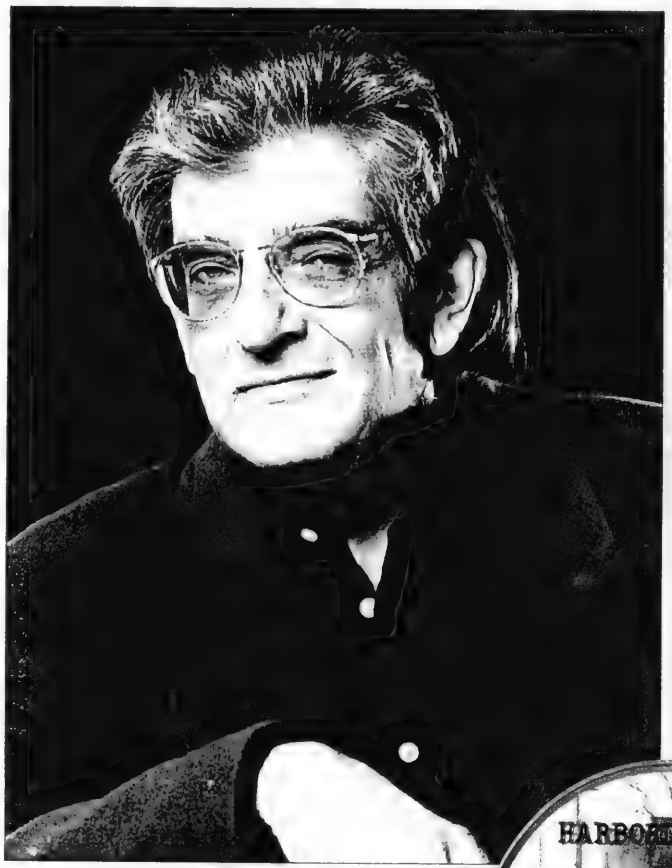
This summer, the Festival of Sound, an annual event in Parry Sound, featured Barnes' Harbord Street, performed by Trio Lyra, the title track of a new CD the trio launched this year.

Barnes recently conducted his own work, Shir Hashirim, at the Song of Songs, a multi-faith concert. And Chamberworks Players premiered his Tango 99 at the du Maurier Centre in Hamilton.

With CD launches, premieres, broadcasts and numerous performances of his music, Toronto-based Barnes continues to bring fresh new sounds to the musical landscape.

Barnes began his musical career as a jazz drummer and guitarist when he was at Oakwood Collegiate.

By his third year, he had formed his own band, and he began earning money playing at resorts in Muskoka, Jackson's Point and at special events elsewhere. He also had a keen interest in acting and appeared in his high school's productions.



Milton Barnes

Barnes grew up in a household that loved music. He was influenced by his mother Yetta, who sang folk songs around the house, and by his father Willie, who loved classical and cantorial music.

"Instead of going into my father's building business where I worked for him during the summers, I chose a musical career. My parents thought it was a gypsy thing to be a musician."

After graduating from high school, Barnes went to study at the Royal Conservatory of Music in Toronto, studying with John Weinzweig and Ernst Krenek.

At the conservatory, where his friends included musicians such as Leon Major and Kurt Reis, he began writing music for university productions. He also studied conducting with some of Canada's best-known maestros, Victor Feldbrill, Boyd Neel and Walter Susskind.

Barnes later graduated from the Vienna Academy of Music, where he studied orchestral and opera conducting, and his reputation as a composer began to take root on the Canadian scene.

He founded the Toronto Repertory Orchestra in 1964, broadcasting and recording extensively for CBC radio and television.

Inspired by his Hebraic lineage

Subsequently, he appeared as guest conductor with orchestras across the country and created scores for television, theatrical productions and films including, Blood and Guts and The Care Bear movies.

In the late '50s, Barnes became aware of a need to look at Jewish music. "There was very little Jewish concert music being written. It was Ernst Bloch's music that influenced me and his music brought awareness of the potentiality of Jewish music. Shortly after, I began writing my first Jewish theme piece, Poème Juif."

With more study of Hebrew and Jewish music, Barnes became inspired by the notion that "I was born into and have a Hebraic lineage from biblical times to the present. I was impressed and it awakened my Jewish psyche."

Simultaneously, while composing universal music, Barnes wrote a number of other works based on Jewish themes, including Lamentations of Jeremiah for cello or viola, which is based on a painting by Rembrandt. And he began arranging music for Jewish holidays and festivals.

A live concert was commissioned by the Toronto Arts Council to honor the music and history of the Toronto Jewish Folk Choir.

Barnes conducted the concert, where his original piece, The Fantasy on Jewish Themes, premiered. It later became the centrepiece of a documentary video of the choir, called Keeping the Flame Alive.

Barnes' Variations on a Hebrew Theme was performed recently by the Amadeus Ensemble featuring violinist Moshe Hammer. Jewish Music Toronto commissioned Séfarad, which was premiered by Zimriyah Choral and subsequently performed by the Elmer Isler Singers and the Jewish Folk Choir.

Barnes has written more than 100 works, mostly on commission, that have been presented by orchestras, chamber groups, choirs, soloists and dance companies.

A recently released CD, titled Erica Goodman and Friends, features Barnes Divertimento for Harp & Strings, one of the most played Canadian chamber works on radio.

Conductor Sir Neville Marriner, jazz flutist Paul Horn, percussion ensemble Nexus, and violist Rivka Golani are among the internationally renowned artists who perform and record his works.

Liona Boyd calls his Fantasy for Guitar "one of my most successful pieces all over the world." She recorded the piece for Columbia Records.

Barnes is very vocal about his "dislike of faddism in music. The current trend in avant-guard music," which he describes as minimalism, "is not challenging to the mind; it is very simplistic," he says.

"We grew up with great lyrics and great music, but when rock music came in, the quality disappeared."

Looking back, Barnes says he takes joy in his musical accomplishments and in his three sons, who have all followed in his footsteps into the world of music. Singer/songwriter Micah was formerly with the Nylons, drummer Daniel is known in Toronto Jazz circles, and Ariel is a cellist in Vancouver.

"Last week, two of my works were broadcast nationally on CBC radio. "I realized that hundreds of thousands of people were listening to and enjoying my music. I get a real kick – it is very satisfying to know that others recognize that my music is good – I feel that I am making a contribution to the world."

Barnes says his latest project is a concert work called The Classical Cat Minnie Minou "to celebrate the 23 birthday of my centenarian feline companion Minnie Minou which I share with my partner Marilyn Wollin."

European Jews: Is there a renaissance?

Ten years after The Wall fell

By RUTH E. GRUBER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

ROME — A decade ago, the Jewish communities in Communist-dominated eastern and central Europe were generally written off as dying remnants of the pre-Holocaust past.

Forty years of Communist restrictions – and decades more than that in what was then the Soviet Union – had compounded the devastation of the Shoah.

Most who openly identified themselves as Jews were elderly. Many, if not most, other Jews chose to conceal or deny their Jewish identity. Many others, particularly in the former Soviet Union, faced active persecution. To many observers, the Jewish chapter in this part of Europe was virtually closed.

The collapse of communism 10 years ago changed everything. The institution of religious freedom and the disintegration of Communist-era taboos triggered social, cultural and religious Jewish revival.

Exact figures have not been compiled, but throughout eastern and central Europe, thousands of Jews, particularly younger people, have discovered, recovered or reclaimed long-buried Jewish roots and openly declared their Jewish identity.

This may be via a superficial public self-identification as a Jew, participation in study groups and secular Jewish activities, or immersion in traditional, religious Jewish life.

Caplan goes to cabinet

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Last week Elinor Caplan was sworn in as Canada's minister of citizenship and immigration, almost exactly a century after her grandparents immigrated from Poland to Canada.

"I guess I've always felt blessed that [my grandparents] chose Canada, and that Canada accepted them," she told The CJN by phone from Ottawa. "We know the history, and I've always felt very fortunate."

Her appointment last week by Prime Minister Jean Chrétien came as a surprise, Caplan said. "It is of course thrilling, and a wonderful honor… So few people ever have the opportunity to [serve in the cabinet of Canada], and to have such a significant portfolio."

Among her responsibilities, Caplan, 55, will oversee substantial changes to the Immigration Act set out in a white paper last winter.

Elinor Caplan

Caplan was elected member of Parliament for Thornhill in June 1997. Previously, from 1985 to 1997, she was an Ontario MPP for the riding of Oriole.

She served as Ontario's minister of health in the late 1980s, under David Peterson's Liberal government. Federally, she served as parliamentary secretary to the health minister. She has held a variety of positions both municipally and provincially since entering politics as a North York alderman in 1978.

International Symposium

TORONTO — The Toronto branch of Ohr Somayach International will participate in an international symposium on Torah Responses to a Challenging Generation. The program will be a day-long series of lectures by staff of Ohr Somayach offered first on Sept. 5 in New York, and on Sept. 6 in Toronto. Lecturers will include rabbis Mordechai Becher, Mendel Weinbach, Dovid Gottlieb, Yitzchok Breitowitz and Eliezer Breitowitz. The Toronto symposium will be held 9:30 a.m. to 6 p.m. at the Leah Posluns Theatre.

Green Wants Bar Mitzvah

TORONTO — Shawn Green, the 26-year-old Toronto Blue Jays outfielder, says he wants to have a belated bar mitzvah.

"Since I've been in the big leagues, I've learned a lot more about my religion, my heritage," Green recently told the New York Times. His heritage helps him when he plays on the road, he said. "I might not get booed as bad as somebody who isn't Jewish in certain cities, because there are always some Jewish fans at the games who are cheering a little bit."

ISRAEL

Israelis Go Without Water

JERUSALEM — Hundreds of thousands of drought-stricken Israelis were without water for several hours last week when disgruntled workers at the state-owned water company cut off the supply. Among the cities affected were Tel Aviv, Herzliyah, Beersheva and Beit Shemesh. Strikers said they would next turn off the taps in Jerusalem.

The job action by workers for Mekorot came after they walked off the job last month in a protest over wages and plans by the government to privatize the company. Mekorot management accused the workers of endangering the public, and appealed to the National Labor Court to order workers against further job actions during negotiations.

Takes Consulting Job

JERUSALEM — Former prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu has agreed to work for an Israeli high-tech company. Netanyahu will serve as a strategic marketing consultant for BATM, the firm's president told Israel Television last week. The firm develops, manufactures and markets communications equipment.

More Kwara Jews Arrive

JERUSALEM — The July 29 arrival of 82 Jews from Ethiopia's Kwara region marks the end of the most recent Israeli government effort to repatriate Ethiopian Jews. Over 1,300 Ethiopian Jews have arrived in Israel since the end of June, when pressure from American Jews and the Jewish Agency for Israel resulted in stepped-up efforts to bring to Israel the Ethiopian Jews left behind in previous operations. According to Jewish Agency officials, approximately 500 Jews remain in Kwara and will be evacuated in the fall after the end of the rainy season.

WORLD

Condemns Anti-Semitism

MOSCOW — Russian President Boris Yeltsin condemned Russian anti-Semitism during a meeting at the Kremlin with Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Barak. Individuals who commit "disgusting acts of anti-Semitism" will be punished, Yeltsin was quoted as saying. He also vowed to increase Russia's role in Middle East peacemaking, which he described as "going too slowly."

During a meeting with Russian Prime Minister Sergei Stepashin, Barak voiced concern about Russian arms sales to Iran.

In a related matter, vandals desecrated six Jewish graves at a cemetery in Siberia. A local prosecutor said the attack in the city of Tomsk, the latest in a series of incidents in Russia involving Jewish targets, was discovered shortly before Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Barak began his visit to Moscow.

Firebomb Explodes

ATHENS — A firebomb recently exploded outside the office of the Greek-Israeli Friendship Union in Athens. No one was in the organization's office at the time of the blast, and the explosion caused no injuries, police said. The device, consisting of two propane gas canisters, caused minor damage to the entrance of the first-floor office.

Bubis Blasts Germans

BERLIN — The leader of Germany's Jewish community, Ignatz Bubis, lashed out at his fellow Germans for refusing to allow the Holocaust to remain in public consciousness.

"Every person in Germany feels responsible for Schiller, for Goethe and for Beethoven, but none for Himmler," Bubis told the weekly newsmagazine Stern. A large part of the German public wants to "only look forward," he said; but he warned that to face the future, they must also look to the past.

New Motion Filed

NEW YORK — Alleged Nazi death camp guard John Demjanjuk has filed a motion to dismiss the U.S. government's latest attempt to strip him of his citizenship. Demjanjuk claimed that the denaturalization proceeding amounted to double jeopardy since he had already faced a similar action. After being stripped of his U.S. citizenship in 1981, Demjanjuk was extradited to Israel in 1986 to stand trial for crimes against humanity. He spent five years on death row before the Israeli Supreme Court determined that there was reasonable doubt that he was the notorious guard known as Ivan the Terrible, who operated a gas chamber at Treblinka in 1942-43.

Ad Removed

NEW YORK — The Lycos Web browser site recently removed an advertisement placed by Jews for Jesus that appeared on the search engine page dealing with Jewish matters.

B'nai Brith Canada welcomed the decision, saying Jews for Jesus had "abused the credentials of a reputable company such as Lycos in order to give legitimacy to propaganda and indoctrination."

The squeeze on the Jewish middle class

By PAUL LUNGEN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Canadians, it is said, are being taxed to death. There's federal tax, provincial tax, property taxes, GST, PST, payroll taxes and numerous fees and levies for necessary services. Add in mortgage payments, insurance fees, car loans, clothing, food and travel expenses and it's understandable why many economists and one national newspaper say that working Canadians are finding it difficult to make ends meet.

Special Report

Yet for many in the Jewish community, contending only with those costs would be a relief, a walk in the park on a sunny day, compared to the much greater financial burden they have taken upon themselves. After all, their non-Jewish neighbors generally don't have to pay for private schools, kosher food, synagogue dues, Jewish camps, bar and bat mitzvahs and the other items of Jewish life that cut into a family budget.

Living a Jewish lifestyle is proving to be very expensive, many in the community are finding. Without meaning to minimize or deprecate the hardships facing low-income families, it is the Jewish middle class, in particular, who may be suffering the most. Well-to-do families are insulated from most costs while lower income families tend to qualify for education subsidies and other financial aid from the various communal institutions.

Guidy Mamann

It is ironic that a time when Jews in the Diaspora have never been freer to live a Jewish lifestyle, the cost of doing so has never been greater.

In an unscientific survey of members of the community, almost all point to the cost of providing a Jewish education as the greatest single cost they incur.

And it was likely always so.

This reporter's father recalls, even in the old country, during the 1930s, not every one could afford to send their children to Jewish day schools. He attended Tarbut, an elementary day school, and recalls that it cost his father about four or five days' wages for one month's tuition.

But as expensive as education may have been in the old country, things appear to have gotten worse. Tuition at a day school can range from $6,000 to $12,000 per student per year. Tuition for children with special needs can be even greater. Tuition at a supplementary school is substantially lower, generally under $1,000 per year.

With three children enrolled in Jewish day schools, a typical family would be faced with costs of $21,000 per year or more. And that's paid for with after-tax income, although a tax receipt is issued for a portion of the fees.

Add to that the cost of sending children to a Jewish camp, synagogue dues, memberships to Jewish organizations, kosher food, the costs of life cycle events like bar and bat mitzvahs and trips to Israel, and about the only bargain for those seeking to maintain a Jewish lifestyle would be an annual subscription to The CJN (under $30).

Zac Kaye, executive-director of Jewish Campus Services of Greater Toronto, believes the daunting costs of affiliation present a ticking time bomb for the Jewish community. "What they are finding in the United States," he said, "is that, without major help, the demographics of the day schools will be made up of people who are poor who qualify for subsidies and the rich. Those in the middle earning professional salaries will be squeezed. My sense is that it's beginning to happen here."

Lawyer Guidy Mamann agrees: "Primarily, the high cost of Jewish education affects the middle class more than anyone else." Low income families qualify for subsidies while the most affluent are not affected, he said.

The father of four girls, Mamann said, "Each will have a Jewish education and I know it's going to cost me a lot of money."

When faced with the tremendous costs associated with a day school education, some families will opt for another solution that is within their financial reach, but Mamann contends that a day school education is crucial to informing Jewish children about their past, and teaching them about Jewish rituals and the importance of avoiding intermarriage.

Serene baseball excellence

We greet each new month in the Hebrew calendar with a lyrically rich and moving prayer that beseeches God to grant us the manifold blessings of life on earth for yet another month.

In the course of expressing our love for and confidence in God, we reassert an everlasting belief in the fellowship of all Jews. Chaverim kol Yisrael.

This sense of fellowship, with its myriad daily manifestations, permeates Jewish life and has done so throughout Jewish history.

Thus, the Jewish Agency, the federation system, indeed all communal associations, are rooted in this sense of fellowship.

We are taught never to stand by in idle inattention at the plight of our fellow Jews. Bred deeply into our framework of values is a sense of shared destiny and common purpose.

For good and for ill, that shared destiny has often meant that the behavior of one Jew has reflected on the status of all Jews. Jewish history is rife with such examples.

That, in part, explains why we often rejoice at the publicly noticed, grand achievements of our co-religionists and recoil at their low misbehaviors.

Of late, the Jewish community in North America, and particularly so in Canada has been able to find great delight in the much noticed achievements of Shawn Green.

Green is a young, 26-year-old Jew presently excelling in the professional sport of baseball for the Toronto Blue Jays.

He plays his right field position with elegance and grace, chasing down fly balls "swiftly as an eagle," and with the "strength of a lion," throwing out runners.

At the plate he combines a keen eye with a sharp inner focus, broad and brawny shoulders and a smooth-as-molasses, controlled swing through the strike zone.

But as impressive as his production with the bat and his reliability with the glove, is his serene, humble, dignified comportment on and off the field. He has never lost his temper in front of the camera; he has never publicly berated a teammate, opponent or umpire.

In all, he has set an outstanding example of exceptional skill and exceptional character for every baseball-loving youngster, Jewish or not. And this has been, perhaps, his greatest achievement.

Because of his superb play as a baseball player, he has attracted the attention of the sports writers.

Because of his superb play as a Jewish baseball player, he has attracted the attention of virtually the entire Jewish community of North America who happen also to be baseball fans.

Reporters throughout the American League are writing about him. Last week, he was the subject of a lengthy story in the New York Times under the headline "Daring to Compare Jays' Green: Budding Star Has Great's Look."

In the article, the reporter, Chris Broussard, wrote: "Green has come to cherish one product of all the attention – an increased awareness of his Jewish heritage. In a sport that historically has boasted few Jewish stars – Sandy Koufax and Hank Greenberg are the only Jewish players in the Hall of Fame – Green has become a source of ethnic pride, drawing cheers from Jewish fans in practically every ball park he enters and being featured in many Jewish publications.

"I definitely get a lot of support from the Jewish community," Green said..."and it feels good to be welcomed like that."

"It's great to have the support of the Jewish community," Green told Rosie DiManno of the Toronto Star.

"It's like being part of a big family, wherever I go."

In those 11 few words, Green eloquently expressed the intangible essence of chaverim kol Yisrael, the fellowship of all Jews.

With Green's rise to the baseball top, there is now speculation that he may wind up playing for the New York Yankees. Given the lore and the lure of the Yankee pinstripe, we understand the gravity in the speculation.

Our first hope for Shawn Green, as an individual and as a person, is that he enjoy a long, exciting, productive, rewarding, satisfying career wherever he chooses to play out his career.

But our second hope is for Shawn Green to be a lifelong member of the Toronto Blue Jays.

We are all so very proud of him. Chaverim kol Yisrael.

Go Jays go!

Number of Jewish immigrants up, JIAS reports

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Jewish Immigrant Aid Services of Canada's (JIAS) national office saw a 13 percent increase in the number of Jewish newcomers sponsored over its last fiscal year, compared to the previous 12 months.

JIAS national's recent annual meeting heard that in 1998- 99, the agency sponsored 1,803 Jewish immigrants in 704 families, in areas outside Toronto and Montreal.

That's up from the 1,593 individuals in 665 families who came under community sponsorship during the previous year.

Again this past year, most newcomers settled by JIAS arrived from the former Soviet Union. Many also came from Brazil and Argentina.

Those sponsored by JIAS's national office settled in Vancouver, Ottawa, Winnipeg, Calgary and other cities. Emigres who chose to live in Toronto and Montreal were sponsored by the local JIAS offices in those cities.

JIAS national president Sharon Hochberg decided not to renew her term. Hochberg, of Winnipeg, stepped down due to "personal family matters," as she put it, paving the way for Bonnie Osoff-Bultz of Calgary to assume the leadership.

Two of them are expected to come under family reunification provisions, one to Vancouver and the other to Tecumseh, Ont.

JIAS says it believes that a third family has gone to Israel.

The fourth, consisting of a single mother and her two children, is expected to arrive in the coming weeks in Windsor, where the Jewish community has offered support.

Another highlight of the past year was the successful Immigrant to Immigrant conference held last May in Winnipeg, at which established immigrants met with more recent newcomers to share their experiences and explore the job market.

The agency's national executive director, Michael Briks, outlined JIAS's goals for the coming year. They include:

- enhancing the agency's presence and influence among other immigrant organizations, such as the Canadian Council for Refugees;
- advancing services to immigrants and refugees in smaller Jewish communities and helping small communities access provincial and federal grant dollars;
- developing an immigrant youth leadership training conference, slated to take place in Montreal in 2000;
- continuing to identify and approach sponsors in the private sector for special projects;
- bolstering relations with federal government departments and with JIAS's global partner, Hebrew Immigrant Aid Services (HIAS);
- and improving consultations with relevant Jewish communal agencies.

Jewish Kosovars on agenda

Osoff-Bultz, a 50-year-old clinical social worker, told The CJN her priorities are to maintain the agency's integrity, and to bring about improved communications between JIAS, the federations and local Jewish family service agencies.

Among the big issues having faced JIAS over the past year was the plight of refugees from Kosovo. The agency was flooded with hundreds of letters, faxes and e-mails offering support for Jewish Kosovars, both those sheltered in Canada and those who fled to neighboring countries.

While none of the Kosovars who stayed at Canadian installations identified themselves as Jewish, overseas, four Jewish Kosovar families had expressed interest in coming to Canada.

Israeli program trains Orthodox men for IDF duty

By NICOLE SALAMA
Student Intern

TORONTO — For most Israelis military service is a given. Men and women generally go into the military at the age of 18.

But not everybody ends up going. An estimated 6.5 percent of men – most of them are haredi – are exempted from the mandatory three year service for religious reasons.

Orthodox men who enlist can go into regular military programs with the majority of Israelis or they can choose other options. Hesder, a three year program divided equally between military training and study at a yeshiva, is a common choice.

Gili Prager chose neither of the above. Instead he opted for Bnai David, a 12-year-old program that helps prepare young Orthodox men to serve a full term in the Israeli Defence Force (IDF) amongst their secular peers.

In Toronto representing Bnai David, Prager recently spoke with The CJN about the program.

It offers a year-long post secondary school program to help ease the transition from school to the military. Prager said 85 percent of the Orthodox men who go into the regular military without participating in special programs lose their religious dedication.

He said he got involved in Bnai David to encourage "Orthodox people to be part of Israeli society and take responsibility in all parts of life, especially in the army."

Named after King David, who was both a learned man and the leader of the army, Prager said the goals of Bnai David are twofold: "to bring up leaders of the next generation in the army to have a solid Jewish education and Jewish point of view of different issues..." and "to do kiruv and be a bridgehead between the Orthodox and non-Orthodox communities."

Prager said Bnai David was founded by Rabbis Eli Sadan and Yigal Levinstein; they stressed the importance of encouraging religious men to enter the military after realizing there was a need for motivated and talented Orthodox military leaders.

Prager said the program accepts 120 applicants out of 600. The boys live on site in Eli, a town in the region of Samaria.

They study classic yeshiva subjects, such as Tanach and Gemarah, and Halachah in a military setting is emphasized. As well, they study Jewish philosophy, general studies and do physical training.

According to Prager, the focus of the studies is to help the students see military service "as a mitzvah of defending the Jewish people and the land of Israel."

Of those who finish the program 50 percent become officers and many pursue higher ranks and military careers, he said.

He added that a program like Bnai David has an impact on Israeli society – it involves the Orthodox community in Israeli life, it bridges the gap between the streams of Judaism and it attracts motivated and talented men to the IDF.

Prager believes that Orthodox men who serve in the IDF are role models. Their dedication is based on "their belief in the Torah and the Jewish people."

CJC SUMMER STUDENT PROGRAM

Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region is marking the 15th anniversary of its summer students' camps program. This year's staff have chosen to create a program which addresses the issues of friendship, leadership, discrimination and bullying, as well as Judaic themes, including an Israel awareness program and one which centres around the concept of tzedakah. Among the program's participants are (from left) Shani Sahian and Monika Rosman, a sciences major at McMaster University and past president of her campus Jewish Student Union. Sahian and Rosman were joined by fellow summer students Stacey Wintre and Morris Glazman for a program at Camp Northland B'nai Brith. Referred to as the Haganah Program, it set out to make a pre-independence Israeli immigrant experience authentic to more than 150 10, 11 and 12-year-olds at the camp.

Federation of Jewish Men's Clubs marks its 70th year

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Jules Surdin

TORONTO — Almost two million Yom Hashoah candles, commemorating those who perished in the Holocaust, have been lit in Jewish homes.

The man who came up with the idea 17 years ago, was honored recently at the Federation of Jewish Men's Clubs (FJMC) 70th anniversary international convention, held at the Nevele Grand Hotel in the Catskills. The organization is an umbrella for men's clubs in Conservative congregations.

Jules Surdin, a past president of the Men's Club at Beth Tzedec Congregation, used to wonder how future generations would commemorate the Holocaust, he told The CJN in a recent interview.

A 79-year-old grandfather of 10 and a past president of the congregation, Surdin proposed in 1982 that Beth Tzedec's Men's Club distribute candles to the congregation in conjunction with Yom Hashoah.

Congregants were encouraged to light the candles on Yom Hashoah and give tzedakah as part of the program, entitled Remember the Six Million.

Funds raised from the 2,200 candles distributed at that time were used to support Jews in Arab lands through the Dr. Ronald Feld Fund.

A native of Toronto, Surdin served in the Royal Canadian Air Force during World War II. The closest he got to Europe, he said, was Dartmouth, N.S. He knew nobody who was lost in the Holocaust.

Surdin's Jewish community involvement goes back to the 1930s, when he served as president of Balfour Boys Club Young Judaea and president of Balfour Lodge of Habonim.

More recently, he was president of the Council of Jewish Brotherhoods, Metro Toronto and president of the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism, Ontario region (now part of Canadian region).

An alumnus of Parkdale Collegiate, Surdin also attended Brunswick Avenue Talmud Torah and Handelman's Cheder.

Longtime Beth Tzedec members, Surdin and his wife Pearl joined Beth Hamidrash Hagadol (the McCaul Street Synagogue) shortly after their marriage in 1944. The congregation later merged with Goel Tzedec to form Beth Tzedec.

Surdin's involvement with the Men's Club began when one of his three daughters attended Sunday school, and he was invited to stay for the Men's Club breakfast meetings.

"This is where you get to know people," he said.

The club has 800 members, of whom 150 to 200 are active, said Surdin.

This year, over 300 Beth Tzedec volunteers packaged candles and hand-delivered them to congregants.

In all, almost 20 Canadian synagogues distribute a total of 10,000 candles yearly. The FJMC distributes 150,000.

Surdin developed idea of Yom Hashoah candles

The program was picked up in the United States after it won an award at a previous FJMC convention. Joseph Winokur of Temple Ner Tamid in Peabody, Mass., who was honored along with Surdin, enhanced the program by developing specialized packaging and a yellow candle (to recall the yellow armbands Jews were required to wear during the Holocaust)

To enhance the program here, Surdin helped create and promote a yahrzeit candle holder designed by Herman Reches, a Toronto ceramicist who died in 1997.

Over the past 17 years, funding from the program – which has also been adopted by some Reform and Orthodox organizations – has benefitted Holocaust memorial activities, Camp Ramah scholarships and Jews in need around the world.

"When I go, I'll go with a smile, because I'll know I did the right things when I was around," said Surdin.

"My dream is that a candle will be lit once a year, on the 27th of Nisan, in every Jewish home in North America."

Honeymoon over?

Barely one month after he cobbled together a governing coalition of 75 Knesset members, it appears Israel's Prime Minister Ehud Barak is being asked to vacate the honeymoon suite. The hard-pounding Israeli media have already resumed the cynical posture they displayed against Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu. Last week for example, Joel Marcus of Ha'aretz wrote: "Within a month of Barak chalking up a landslide victory, the media wondered if we hadn't exchanged Netanyahu for Barakyahu."

And the ever expressive, never diffident, Israeli public, their expectations raised by the nature and the extent of Barak's election victory, is also beginning to grumble its disappointment.

The public's assessment of its new prime minister's performance was released last week in a survey conducted by Professor Ephraim Yaar and Dr. Tamar Hermann of The Tami Steinmetz Centre for Peace Research at Tel Aviv University. Some 501 people were interviewed by telephone for the survey, a representative sample of the adult Jewish population in Israel, including residents of the territories and the kibbutzim. The poll's margin of error was 4.5 percent.

The following are some of the survey's key findings: "The public is divided between those claiming that Barak's policy is indeed different in both form and content from that of Benjmain Netanyahu and those claiming it is either different only in style or not at all...The public is also divided over whether the timetables Barak has established for the various channels of the peace process are helpful or harmful to Israel's interests, with greater numbers believing they are harmful rather than helpful.

"It appears that Barak's new national priorities, placing peace before social-domestic issues, does not enjoy broad support among the public. Moreover, there is also significiant objection to Barak's approach to the peace process, as expressed in the presentation of defined timetables for advancing the process. In addition, there appears to be broad agreement among the public that peace with the Arab world cannot be expected to contribute to resolving the internal problems of Israeli society."

The survey is instructive at a number of levels, not the least of which is the one that demonstrates how intense and unceasing is the Israeli public's scrutiny of its leaders' decisions and its involvement in the politics of the country. Is any public office in the democratic world more demanding?

Good luck, minister

It is with heartfelt sincerity and pride that we extend congratulations to Elinor Caplan, who last week was appointed to the federal cabinet as Minister of Citizenship and Immigration by Prime Minister Jean Chrétien. In addition to considerable governmental experience, Caplan also brings a sharp intellect, a deep sense of justice, and unequalled compassion for the wellbeing of others to the federal cabinet table. May God grant her the wisdom to exercise true and just authority in her new, challenging responsibilities. We wish her well.

Media ignores equal school funding crisis

Saskatchewan is finally free of prayer in public schools. Thank God!

In the flurry of recent general media coverage on this issue, much has been written about the importance of being sensitive to the rights and sensibilities of non-Christian religious minorities. Sensitivity to the different needs of the various religious minorities that make up our multicultural society is admirable. And imposing Christian-only prayers in secular public schools raises serious concerns.

But is the media's professional concern for religious minorities genuine? For the most part, I doubt it.

In Ontario, explicit state-sponsored religious discrimination in education funding is almost completely ignored by the media. Ontario is the only jurisdiction in the western world that fully funds denominational education for one religious group (Catholics) while offering zero funding for denominational schools of other religious minorities like Muslims, Jews, Protestants, Hindu and Sikhs. The court has confirmed that there is no legal barrier for the government to extend funding to all denominational schools equally. The virtual silence of the general media on this issue is deafening.

Last May 4, 5,000 people representing a cross-section of religious minorities rallied at Queen's Park against this religious discrimination in school funding. Yet not one story was written in the National Post or any other general newspaper about this event! Letters to the editor of the general newspapers are studiously ignored.

Bad as it may be to impose a Christian prayer at the beginning of the public school day, it is not as bad as explicitly and completely excluding religious minority groups from funding for an essential public service that is provided to the largest religious group.

Why then the selective media coverage? Does the general media believe it is fair to treat some religious groups as "more equal" than others?

Talmud message inspires respect for aged

Regarding Rabbi Gunther Plaut's article "Rising for the aged" (CJN, July 8): It's a pity. We spend thousands of dollars to educate our children in the day schools; however, we miss out on the very basics – drech eretz kadma laTorah.

If I ever go back to teaching, I would take the children on the bus and/or subway and let them begin by reading the signs that clearly state that the seats are reserved for the elderly and the disabled.

So parents and educators, why not begin with this simple lesson, which would make our Torah teaching more meaningful?

86-year old volunteers six days a week

Re William Rosenthal's article on volunteers (CJN, July 8): I am a young 86 years old and do volunteer work six days a week: at Baycrest Centre two days, at Sunnybrook Health Science Centre two days, and at the Tender Care Nursing home.

Cowardly murders marked end of Soviet Jewish life

By ADAM FUERSTENBERG
Special to The CJN

During the night, exactly 47 years ago on Aug. 12, 1952, 24 of the Soviet Union's leading Yiddish poets, writers, and intellectual leaders were led down into the basement of Moscow's notorious and dreaded Lubianka Prison. Even as they protested their innocence, they were each shot.

For these tragic victims, this cowardly murder was the merciful end to almost four years of deprivation and physical and psychological torture. For Jews in the Soviet Union it also marked an end, the end of organized Jewish life under communism, an ideology which many had embraced with enthusiasm and hope after the Russian Revolution of 1917. They had envisaged the Bolshevik Revolution as the harbinger of Jewish emancipation from Czarist anti-Semitism.

Instead, Stalin's dictatorship turned out to be more oppressive than the Czar's. The executions in Lubianka Prison were the culmination of Stalin's systematic attempts (since the 1930s) to destroy forever the Jewish community in Russia. In 1952 his paranoia, and the political machinations of those around him who saw an advantage in having Jews as scapegoats in the Cold War with the West, convinced him that the Jews of Russia were "rootless cosmopolitans" devoid of loyaltly to the Russian homeland.

He was convinced that they were a threat to the regime and even to him personally. Fortunately, his brutal attempt to destroy Jewish culture failed, and, ironically, his failure eventually led to dissent and the phenomenon of the Refuseniks — most of them Jewish — which contributed to the dissolution of the Soviet Union. But he came very close to succeeding; only his death in 1953 prevented a catastrophe for the Jews of Russia.

The revival of anti-Semitism had its roots in Stalin's prewar policy towards the Jews in Russia, but it was accelerated by the new international rivalries after the defeat of Hitler. The Cold War, which followed the World War II almost immediately, resulted in competition for dominance with the West, especially the U.S.

Russian propaganda became relentless in picturing capitalist countries as corrupt and evil, and it led to a concurrent rise in Russian nationalism. Russians came to fear anything western. Spurred on by this nationalism, with its ancient tradition of anti-Semitism, the favorite target soon became the Jews, conveniently identified by the euphemism – "international cosmopolitans."

Yet that same "cosmopolitanism" had been activated and encouraged by Stalin himself during the War when he needed the Allies' support in his military struggle with Hitler. In 1942, soon after the Nazi invasion of Russia, Stalin organized the Jewish Anti-Fascist Committee to enlist wartime support for Russia among Jews in the West, especially the U.S.A.

Under the leadership of the great actor Solomon Mikhoels, the director of the Moscow Yiddish State Theatre, hundreds of Jewish writers, artists, and intellectuals joined wholeheartedly to fight the common enemy, and Soviet Jews came to regard the Anti-Fascist Committee as the symbol of a revived organized Jewish leadership.

The Committee even published a Journal, Eynikayt (Unity), which provided a popular forum for expressions of Jewish national sentiment and emphasized the unity of Soviet Jews with world Jewry, something unthinkable earlier. Jewish writers began once again to use Jewish historical and religious themes. The Committee even published manifestos in which Mikhoels spoke to "Brother Jews," while the great Yiddish writer Peretz Markish wrote that "we are one people, and now we are becoming one army."

In 1944, at the height of this revived Jewish national consciousness, Mikhoels and Colonel Itzik Feffer, a decorated war hero and renowned Yiddish poet, were allowed to tour the United States to speak at public gatherings before more than half a million Jews. They collected what in today's currency would be almost $100 million for the Soviet war effort.

Tragically and ironically that same rekindling of Jewish national consciousness in Russia, on behalf of the Soviet war effort, became the basis for the cynical accusation of disloyalty which Stalin used to murder the Jewish writers who had been the leaders of the Anti-Fascist Committee.

In fact, the anti-Jewish campaign began almost immediately after the end of the World War II, when what little of Yiddish and organized Jewish activity that had survived the anti-Jewish 1930s began to be severely curtailed. Now that Russia had emerged triumphant and the enemy was once again the capitalist West, Jewish international solidarity was no longer desirable and therefore perceived as a threat by Russian nationalists. The way to eliminate the threat was to destroy the revived Yiddish consciousness by murdering or imprisoning its wartime leadership.

Anti-Jewish campaign began after World War II

On Sept. 21, 1948, Illya Ehrenburg, a leading Russian writer of Jewish parentage, and a confidante of Stalin and inner circles of the Party, wrote the opening shot of the official campaign in the newspaper, Pravda. He warned Russia's Jews that identifying with Jews in the rest of the world, and especially Israel, would demonstrate their disloyalty to Russia.

In short order thereafter, authorities closed the Yiddish publishing house Emes, the twice-weekly Yiddish newspaper Heymland in Kiev, the last two Yiddish schools, the Yiddish theatres, and all amateur Jewish artistic groups. The Anti-Fascist Committee was disbanded and its Journal, Eynikayt, closed in November of 1948, just one month after Ehrenburg's warning. Suddenly, Jewish books also disappeared into restricted collections at libraries.

But the final act began, brutally and spectacularly, on a dreary January 13 in 1948, in Minsk. Mikhoels, who had been sent there on a false official mission as a member of the Stalin Prize Committee, was summoned from his hotel room late that night to meet a Communist party official.

The next morning, his battered, bloody body was found near the railway station. The secret police had murdered him and an accompanying Jewish theatre critic, Golubov-Potapov, by running over them with a heavy truck to make it look like an accident.

Although Mikhoels was given an official state funeral — his body lay in state at the Yiddish State Theatre with tens of thousands paying their last respects — no one in the Soviet Union was fooled. In fact, Stalin wanted the truth about the murder publicized so as to terrorize the Jewish population in preparation for the "official" campaign against them.

Soon after Mikchoel's death came Ehrenburg's Pravda article, as well as other articles by lesser figures in different state-sanctioned publications. During the winter of 1948-49 the secret police arrested thousands of Jewish writers, poets, artists, musicians, and scientists, as well as senior Jewish government and party officials.

The first of the famous 24 to be arrested was Colonel Itzik Feffer, the most loyal and enthusiastic Communist among all the writers. To demoralize the Jewish population, and to spread fear and uncertainty, the secret police deliberately spaced subsequent arrests.

The best known writers knew what was coming but had no way to escape. Der Nister, pen name of the great Yiddish writer Pinkhas Kahanovitch, reportedly greeted the secret policemen who came to arrest him with the almost relieved exclamation – "Ah, at last!"

The exact numbers were never determined, but one accepted authority lists 431 outstanding Soviet Jewish artists arrested during this winter alone – 217 writers and poets, 108 actors, 87 painters and sculptors, and 19 leading musicians and composers. There were many hundreds more, who were not as well known or only beginning to get attention in their field, and then there were also the scientists, academics and intellectuals, as well as party and government figures. Even Molotov's (the U.S.S.R.'s foreign minister during the war) Jewish wife was arrested.

The families of prisoners were also victims — wives, children, fathers, brothers, sisters, aged parents, even in-laws — all vanished into the Gulag or became social outcasts. Most of the prisoners died in labor camps – Der Nister who died from deprivation on June 4, 1950, was only 65 years old.

From July 11 to July 18, the 24 who had survived the camps and imprisonment, were tried on trumped up charges of being "enemies of the U.S.S.R., agents of American imperialism, bourgeois nationalist Zionists and rebels who sought by armed rebellion to separate the Crimea from the Soviet Union and to establish their own bourgeois nationalist Zionist republic there."

The charges were patently absurd when one considers that among the 24 who were murdered was Solomon Lozovsky, 74, a member of the Central Committee of the Communist Party and former deputy foreign minister. The charges related to the setting up of a separate state in the Crimea were especially ridiculous when one considers that Israel had already been established with U.N. approval – including Russia's vote.

The 24 defendants refused to plead guilty in spite of the torture and deprivation. Peretz Markish and the elderly Lozovsky defended themselves forcefully and accused the accusers of being the real criminals and traitors. Markish, the leading figure among the 24 and the only Yiddish writer to have been awarded the Order of Lenin, must have suffered immense torture after the trial because he was reportedly insane at the time of his execution.

In November 1955, well after then premier Nikita Khrushchev's denunciation of Stalin's crimes, the widows of the murdered writers were given documents of "rehabilitation" for their dead husbands, but the terms of the "rehabilitation" were never made public. The terror against the Jewish community in the Soviet Union, or the murder of the 24, was never acknowledged by subsequent Soviet regimes.

However, in spite of the fact that the terror campaign left Soviet Jewry without artistic, intellectual, or communal leadership or institutions for almost a generation, Stalin's campaign ultimately failed. Jewish national and religious sentiment went underground and eventually led successfully to the movement of Refuseniks, which contributed directly to the end of communism in the Soviet Union and to a massive wave of Jewish immigration to Israel.

Today Jewish schools, summer camps, synagogues, newspapers, drama groups, even institutes of Jewish study, have been established. A new generation of Jewish cultural and communal leadership is emerging.

In Israel, Russian Jewish creativity once more expresses itself in three languages: Hebrew, Russian, and Yiddish. Among the most prominent of the new Russian writers in Israel is David Markish, the son of the great poet. He, and his mother Esther Markish, were among the first wave of Russian Refuseniks to arrive in Israel in 1972.

The new Germany

I read recently that the city of Weimar was named by the European Union as the cultural capital of the continent. Until 10 years ago, it was a part of the German Democratic Republic and was a prime locus for repressive communism. Today, however, Weimar can relish its earlier and truly distinguished past.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

The city had hosted a bevy of world-renowned residents, the likes of Goethe, Schiller, Nietzsche, Herder and others, and then became the city where the short-lived "Weimar Republic" was established in 1919.

It is also worth noting how the city dealt with "the other Weimar." The Nazi government had decided to build Buchenwald, its infamous concentration camp, at the outskirts of the lovely city. To Weimar's credit, it did not try to hide its proximity to the camp, but made a serious effort to acknowledge this connection and its shamefulness. In this regard, it adopted the best that the new Germany has brought to its history.

This relates cogently to my own reaction to the country in which I and many generations before me were born.

I was 22 years old when I was forced out of my legal career and migrated to the United States. Later, during the war years, when I became a chaplain in the 104th Infantry, we were fated to open the first concentration camp that the western Allies reached and saw the horrors that the Nazis had wrought.

When the war was over I was sure that I would never again set foot on the soil of the country of my birth. However, in 1956, when I enjoyed a sabbatical and made a trip through Europe with my wife and children, we came close to the Dutch/German border. I persuaded myself and my family to visit the place of my own birth, because the city of Muenster was only an hour away.

It turned out to be a terrible mistake. For the fewer than 24 hours we spent in Muenster, I did nothing but look at the hands of people to see whether they had any blood on them. We left post-haste.

But a few years later, when the German government gave me an opportunity to study its new educational approach to the teaching of the Holocaust, I accepted, although with serious reservations. I found an enormous change. The land in which the idea of the Holocaust was spawned had confronted it fully in all its terror. It paid restitution to individuals, it provided the physical infrastructure for Israel – and its education squarely dealt with what had taken place. A new Germany had come into being, a new land that tried to shed its past without denying it.

A hundred thousand Jews are now living in the country, and I have no doubt that in the years to come there will be a vibrant community that will make a great contribution to Jewish as well as German culture.

In that sense, the city of Weimar represents the new Germany at its best, with all its positive and negative memories.

Israelis at the mall

Anybody who has spent at least one weekend in Jerusalem knows that Saturday night here is different from other major cities. If for no other reason than that during the 25 hours before nightfall Saturday, Jerusalem is in its Shabbat mode of suspended animation. And with the end of the Sabbath, Jerusalem reawakens with a passion.

Robert Sarner in Jerusalem

This Saturday evening, it's not hard to predict where you'll be able to feel it most. True to what is now a weekly tradition, the city's biggest mob scene will be at the Jerusalem Mall. Like the past 300 motza'ei Shabbat since it opened in 1994, thousands of Israelis will converge on this giant shopping centre in the southwest part of the capital. It may be modest next to Edmonton's megamall but Jerusalem residents like to boast that theirs – also known as the Malcha Mall for its location in the city's Malcha neighborhood – is the biggest in the entire Middle East.

Not for the faint of heart or the claustrophobic, the Saturday night scene at the Jerusalem Mall is an assault on the senses. However, along with one of the most offensive public address systems on the planet, this obviously doesn't seem to bother the crowds who are part of the assault.

Every Saturday evening, barring the unforeseen, some 10,000 people pack into the three-level shopping emporium, home to 175 stores, restaurants, cinemas and other assorted businesses. It's noisy, odorous and worst of all, terribly crowded.

Like most public places in the country, the mall was built without enough space for people or their cars. The worst illustration of this repeats itself every evening – especially on Saturday when hordes of shoppers head to the mall for their post-Shabbat retail fix and to make the scene.

A scene in which people seem to savor the privilege of being packed like lemmings, cheek by jowl, snaking their way through this monument to conspicuous consumption. For many, and not just teenagers, it's a weekly pastime.

It's an increasingly common sight in Israel. Over the past decade, Israel has been malled like most of the world. Shopping centres have sprouted all over the country in a binge of commercial development that is part of a larger Americanization of Israeli society.

The international fast-food outlets, European designer stores and overflowing car parks are billed as a testament to the Israeli economic miracle of the 1990s. They also point to one of the economy's greatest riddles – How do Israelis afford it? But let's leave that enigma for another column.

The malling of Israel has been led by Canadian developer David Azrieli, who introduced the first shopping centre to Israel in Ramat Aviv in the early 1980s. Since then, he's built several others in Tel Aviv, Beersheva and Jerusalem, where he constructed the Malcha Mall. He even coined the Hebrew term, canion, now commonly used to refer to a shopping centre.

The attraction of these places to Israelis is obvious. For a people still playing catch-up with consumer culture and creature comforts, the mall represents the pinnacle of the American shopping experience and one of modernity's greatest inventions. It is seen as an intrinsic part of contemporary urban life, offering an air conditioned, sanitized refuge from Israel's otherwise sweaty, rough and tumble retail street experience.

To most people, these malls deserve the ultimate Israeli compliment – they almost make you feel like you're hutz-la'aretz – not in Israel.

Of course, malls are not for everyone. Their tightly controlled, highly synthetic environment may make the world safe and comfy for shopping but leaves some people fleeing to the nearest exit. Understandably. How long do you want to be in an enclosed place with no windows to open, no fresh air to breathe and no sense of nature? All this to the tune of insidious muzak and hype-filled announcements broadcast three times too loud over the P.A. system.

Sadly, the shopping centre seems to have largely supplanted the traditional public square. For some, especially young people, going to the mall has become their main cultural life.

This Saturday evening, like clockwork, the crowds will be back again at the Jerusalem Mall, fighting for a parking space before squeezing into the hard, artificial reality they seem to crave. Presumably they'll have a good time – or why else would they keep coming back, week after week, for more abuse? It can't be simply a need to get out of the house and be surrounded by thousands of other people doing the same thing. Or can it?

The right thing

In Canada, the United Nations is generally viewed as a sacred institution, and the decisions and reports issued in New York and Geneva are holy writ. Many Canadian politicians, journalists and academics ignore the political nature of the UN, in which power and national interests are far more important than any moral claims.

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

This distorted view has often colored Canadian policies in the Middle East, and led to intense criticism of Israel. The Arab and Third World bloc uses its power in the UN to promote anti-Israeli resolutions and policies, and then Canadian officials and "intellectuals" criticize Israel for rejecting these resolutions. The United States generally opposes such anti-Israeli activities, and in the past, Canada has also avoided participating in efforts to abuse the UN in this way.

However, recently, this approach has changed, and Canada has often joined the anti-Israeli majority. By taking the opposite position, Canadian politicians also try to enhance their domestic political standing by showing independence from the Americans. Israel is often used as a scapegoat when other democracies, such as Canada, wish to assert their sovereignty.

Last February, the Canadian government supported the initial decision in the UN to convene an "extraordinary meeting" of the UN under the Fourth Geneva Convention governing treatment of civilians in occupied lands during wartime. The United States and Israel opposed this resolution, and 36 nations abstained, but Canada cast its vote and turned its moral influence against Israel.

Since the Fourth Geneva Convention was signed in 1949, this was the first time that it was used as the basis for a special meeting. In contrast, between 1948 and 1967, when Jerusalem's ancient Jewish Quarter was desecrated while under Arab occupation and the areas under Jordanian control were "ethnically cleansed," the Convention was forgotten. Waging war and attacking one's neighbors, it appears, is acceptable, but taking action in the face of repeated aggression is wrong, in this warped moral universe.

With this background, the Canadian decision against participating in last month's meeting in Geneva represents an important exception to the pattern.

However, it is not enough for Canada to simply stay home. If international law is to have any meaning, countries such as Canada, for whom morality is important, must actively work to end the abuse. Enough damage resulted from the short meeting of the Geneva conference, which adopted a resolution that "reaffirmed the applicability of the Fourth Geneva Convention to the occupied Palestinian territory, including east Jerusalem." This absurd resolution gave official UN recognition to east Jerusalem as "occupied Palestinian territory." The UN is a major part of the continuing Palestinian and Arab political warfare against Israel, and the next step will be an effort to impose sanctions on Israel.

In the face of the efforts to hijack the UN, Canada has a responsibility to take a strong position. By taking a firm and consistent stand against the hypocrisy that invokes warped definitions of international law, Canada can help to put an end to the diplomatic war against Israel.

At the same time, the Canadian government has also promised to do the right thing with respect to a proposed sale of nuclear technology to Iran.

The radical Islamic regime in Iran continues to abuse human rights (as seen in the recent arrest of 13 Jews), and to threaten Israel. Iran continues to make progress in efforts to acquire nuclear weapons and long-range missiles. In this context, the eagerness of some Canadian officials to sell experimental nuclear technology to Iran came as a shock. This is the approach that we have come to expect, unfortunately, from Russia, China and North Korea.

Canada does not fit into this list of problem states for whom democracy and human rights are of no importance.

The Canadian Centre for Fusion Magnetics (CCFM) was ready to make a quick buck from Iran, regardless of the consequences to Israel and the rest of the world. The director of the CCFM spoke about "an open friendly policy toward Iran," and invoked the anti-American card to support the planned sale. From this perspective, democracy and human rights are of little importance compared to defying America, and threatening neighbors with annihilation is permissible when commerce is involved. However, the Ministry of Foreign Affairs and International Trade in Ottawa appears to have had enough common sense to veto the proposed sale.

In a world dominated by power and cynicism, Canada can still play an important role by emphasizing moral and humanitarian issues. This means taking principled positions in cooperation with the United States, and not seeking to score points or curry favor by being anti-American and anti-Israeli.

The Kirshner File

Emulating Israel, Egypt develops the Sinai

"Camel, mister?" The insistent question was posed in the inky blackness of a cool pre-dawn morning by a scruffy bedouin Arab squatting beside his snorting, smelly camel.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Visitors ascending Mt. Sinai, revered by Jews, Muslims and Christians, no longer have to trudge up the storied mountain for an unforgettable view of the sunrise. For a price, the lazy and the unfit can mount a camel and ride most of the way up. I politely declined, preferring to walk.

Readily available camels are not the only convenience on the trail leading to Mt. Sinai. Should you be thirsty or hungry, five tea houses offer hot and cold drinks, chocolate bars and light snacks before you reach the daunting 3000 Steps of Repentance, the gateway to the stony summit.

On my first ascent of Mt. Sinai 20 years ago, when Israel occupied the Sinai Peninsula, there were few such conveniences. You either walked up, carrying your own water and food, or you were left behind.

Israel captured the Sinai Peninsula, that great and terrible void of the Bible, during the 1967 Six Day War. It immediately became a mecca for vacationing Israelis awed by its splendid desert vistas, its intoxicating coastlines, its luxuriant oases, its vast open spaces and its profound solitude.

Prior to the Israeli era, the Sinai was an Egyptian fortress, bristling with menacing military bases and air fields. Egypt, seemingly oblivious to its natural wonders, did little to nurture its immeasurable tourist potential.

Israel also used the Sinai for military purposes. The Israeli army made use of Egyptian military facilities and constructed a string of fortifications along the length of the Suez Canal known as the Bar-Lev Line. But under Israel, Sinai positively blossomed. Resorts in sun-kissed places like Dahab and Sharm el Sheikh were built. Roads were upgraded, and beaches improved. Tourists, local and foreign alike, flocked to the Sinai in droves, and I was one of them.

I discovered Sinai shortly after the Six Day War, on my first trip to Israel. I did not get any further than a rudimentary camping ground in Taba, but I was duly impressed. The jagged granite peaks, the turquoise waters of the Gulf of Aqaba and the starry, starry skies insinuated themselves deeply into my soul.

In the intervening years, I usually returned to the Sinai on visits to Israel. In 1983, a year after Israel withdrew from all of Sinai but the Taba enclave, I went back yet again. But for the freshly painted road signs in Arabic, Sinai was as immutably pristine as ever. Yet, I wondered what Egypt had in store for it. Would the Egyptians, inspired by Israel's vision, further develop Sinai into an eco-tourist destination?

Several months ago, when the weather in the Middle East was temperate, I decided to find out for myself. I joined Trek Holiday's three-week organized tour of Egypt. Trek, based in Edmonton, has a branch office in Toronto, the Adventure Centre (922-7584), which caters to hardy travellers who do not demand five-star hotel accommodation.

I spent almost a week in the Sinai before heading off for a jaunt of the awesome Western Desert and a Nile River cruise which included tours of ancient temples, monuments and crypts in Luxor, Edfu, Kom Ombo and Aswan.

Sinai bound, we crossed into the triangular-shaped peninsula from the ragged city of Suez, which was bombarded by Israeli gunners during the 1967-1970 War of Attrition. The landscape was flat and monotonous as we headed for Nakhl, a forlorn, flyblown outpost in the dead centre of Sinai.

From Nakhl, the serpentine asphalt road wound to Nuweiba, an oasis that was the site of a thriving Israeli moshav.

I was stunned by the transformation. The moshav was gone, having been replaced by a gated housing estate graced by palm trees, and the old tourist village was considerably larger. Amid the souvenir shops of the honky tonk bazaar, I saw footloose Israeli tourists checking out the wares.

Israelis still gravitate to Sinai in force,which accounts for the fact that the friendly shopkeepers here speak near-idiomatic Hebrew. But nowadays, Italian holidaymakers on package tours outnumber Israelis.

Nuweiba, having experienced a building boom, has grown into a full-fledged town with its own port. The residential neighborhoods, composed of nondescript flats with courtyards bereft of lawns and little shrubbery, are almost uniformly drab. Nuweiba's finest asset, its beach, faces a brooding Saudi Arabian escarpment whose pastel colors change by the hour. Unfortunately, the beach was littered with discarded bottles, jerry cans and plastic bags. An environmental consciousness is sorely lacking here.

Egypt is eager to develop the sparsely populated Sinai to relieve pressure on the crowded Nile Valley. Within about a decade, Sinai's population is expected to climb to three million from the present 300,000.

Since Israel relinquished Sinai as part of its historic peace treaty with Egypt, Egyptian and European investors have poured hundreds of millions of dollars into it. More than 100 resorts are planned, and some are already under construction. The Hilton chain, for example, intends to double its hotels along the coast to eight, by 2000, to accommodate the crush of nature lovers, hikers, divers, snorkelers and wind surfers.

From Nuweiba, the Colored Canyon, one of the Sinai's chief attractions, is easily accessible. I enjoyed a bumpy jeep tour of this picturesque region, which is largely untouched by modern civilization.

Further south, St. Catherine's monastery beckons, a walled tan compound more than a thousand years old. Tended to by 22 Greek Orthodox monks, it lies in the shadow of Mt. Sinai.

In Israeli times, tourists staying overnight for the early morning ascent to Mt. Sinai were permitted to sleep in a simple dormitory attached to the monastery. But of late, they must spend the night at a hotel in St. Catherine's village, a jumble of concrete buildings and bedouin dwellings which, until a few years ago, did not even exist.

In line with its policy, Egypt is also developing the rather bleak, somewhat industrialized Gulf of Suez coastline. From Abu Rodeis to Ras al-Sudr, vacation resorts and hotels are sprouting up like dandelions in spring.

The Egyptians, in short, have belatedly but enthusiastically embraced the idea that there is money to be made in the harsh wilderness of the Sinai Peninsula.

Selective history

The National Military Museum in central Cairo, which I visited in March, glorifies Egypt's armed forces at Israel's expense. No surprise here.

Outside, in a spacious courtyard, two Israeli tanks, their turrets askew, are mounted on platforms, an M-60 and an M-48 disabled in the 1973 Yom Kippur War. The war in the Sinai, more or less, ended in a draw, but Egypt regards it as a victory.

In the foyer of the main building, a visitor is greeted by a striking mural. It shows heroic, heavily armed Egyptian naval commandos, scrunched together in a pontoon, heading toward the supposedly impregnable Israeli-held Bar-Lev Line. Around the corner is a crude painting of an Israeli jet crashing in flames. On display in a glass case, is an authentic Torah scroll, captured from an Israeli fortification in the Sinai. On a recent trip to Cairo, President Ezer Weizman asked for its return.

I searched high and low for an exhibit about the Six Day War, which Egypt lost decisively, but none was to be found. Call it a selective and myopic reading of history!

JEWISH EDUCATION
The Next Generation

The importance of teachers

By ELLIOTT MALAMET

Canadian writer Margaret Atwood once recounted a conversation that she had a dinner party. She was asked her vocation by another guest, who offered that he was a neurosurgeon. When Atwood revealed her identity, the man smiled broadly and said, "I think I'll try writing novels after I retire," as though nothing could be simpler.

"Oh really," Atwood replied coyly. "Because I was thinking that after I finish with producing fiction, I'd try my hand at neurosurgery."

We live in a culture that often belittles teachers, sometimes with gentle chiding and sometimes with out and out contempt. The implication of much of the rhetoric surrounding the profession of education is that it is a domain for those who could not succeed elsewhere. Besides, how difficult could it be to tell kids how to do fractions and read Catcher in the Rye? Anyone could do it – right?

This mindset applies even more to Jewish education. It is a profession that is respected in theory and trashed in practice. Whether it is rabbis in ultra-Orthodox schools whose paycheques are often long overdue, or afternoon school teachers who are seen as babysitters in the lion's den, the discordance between an ostensible respect for Jewish education and the true facts of the matter are ever widening.

In the range of professions that Jewish parents desire for their kids, does becoming a Jewish educator ever make the top 10? Does it rank at all? Would not a secret shudder roll down Dad's spine if, say, his son opted out of medical school to become a teacher of Rashi and Rambam? The reader will object with the oft-used canard that "we encourage our children to be whatever they desire, and accept their choices."

But this paragon of liberal tolerance avoids the fact that children absorb quickly the values of their parents in all areas, including what kind of jobs would be acceptable.

In those parts of the Jewish world – and this generally works in direct proportion to Torah observance – where learning Torah is seen not just as a means to an end, but rather as an end in itself, the children will associate the teaching of Torah with honor and ultimate importance. It is the dissemination of God's word and the backbone of the Jewish people's survival.

But in our often assimilated Jewish reality of today, Jewish education is not viewed as a fit profession for our children, whose destiny lies in jobs where money is the axis around which all other considerations revolve.

And as we all know, money is not the great enticement in Jewish education. Hence, one could rehearse the circularity of the dilemma which spins inside of a parent's brain: "I'd be sanguine with my child becoming a Jewish educator if there was some money in it, but of course I don't really think Jewish educators should be as well paid as other professionals."

The inexorable and bitterly ironic conclusion to all this is that we often bemoan the quality of the Jewish education that our children receive. If only they had better teachers! If only it weren't so dull! And no connection is made between these thoughts and the other parts of the pedagogical puzzle.

"I saw the best minds of my generation destroyed by madness," raged Alan Ginsberg in Howl, words which many years later tragically resonate for anyone interested in the future of Jewish education. Where are the best minds of our generation? Jewish children everywhere await you with open souls. Serious applicants only.

Finding your bashert

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

It's impossible to talk about Jewish dating without eventually stumbling upon the word "bashert." Translated as "fated," it is often used to mean the predestined soulmate [http://marketing.cbs.com/primetime/nanny/yiddish/yiddish_beshert.html].

According to tradition, 40 days before the creation of the embryo, God has already decided one's bashert [http://www.countryyossi.com/nov98/torah.htm].

But Rabbi Shlomo Riskin says that just because your soulmate is predestined doesn't mean you don't have to get moving [http://www.ohrtorah.org.il/parsha/5758/besh.htm]. He quotes the Gemarah's incredible statement that "bringing two people together in marriage is as difficult as the splitting of the Red Sea." (Sanhedrin 22a)

God was prepared to split the Red Sea to save the Israelites, but the Israelites had to make the first move. "Comparing marriage to the splitting of the Red Sea is how the sages address the doubts and fears all couples face. The comparison tells the questioning and even fearful loving friends at the brink of a critical decision that they have to take the plunge, make the first move, be willing to work hard and to constantly move forward. Neither he nor she may sit back and wait for 'bashert.'"

You can also listen to Rebbitzen Rookie Billet who analyzes some very basic questions such as, "What is a bashert?" "Why do I meet people who are unworthy of my love, yet fall in love with them?" and "Is it better to be married and miserable or single and miserable?" [http://www.613.org/subject.html#love]. To find the answers, Billet looks to the relationships of Adam and Eve and of the matriarchs and patriarchs. And for more on bashert, see [http://www.jewishinterest.com/May%20%2097%20Articles/Meaningbasherte.html].

In Judaism, much importance is given to the halachot of lashon hara – the laws governing gossip and slander. But what are you to do if you are trying to seek or give information about a potential mate that may be quite negative? Shmiras Haloshon and Shidduchim: A Delicate Balance [http://shemayisrael.co.il/shidduchim/balance.htm] examines this issue in detail and gives some guidelines about saying what must be said. Here are a few of the suggestions you'll find at this site:

- Think through your response carefully.
- Don't exaggerate.
- Ensure that the information is transmitted in the least harmful way possible.
- And weigh the amount of harm your information is liable to cause against its benefit.

The site emphasizes that even when negative information is given for the constructive purpose of a shidduch, it is not considered lashon hara.

Sometimes all the work to find a bashert does pay off. Larry and Sherrie Klein of Walnut Creek, Calif. are proof [http://www.jcn18.com/scripts/jcn18/paper/article.asp?ArticleID=575]. It all began with a poem Larry posted at a Jewish singles computer bulletin board: "Witty and smart may be his best traits/ Women have a good time when he takes them on dates." That caught Sherrie's eye and after a lot of correspondence (and even some online investigation by Sherrie), the two finally met and eventually married.

Of course, at the ceremony, their rabbi couldn't help but make reference to the couple's high-tech beginnings when he wished them "May all your software be shareware."

Why we act the way we do

Time, Love, Memory – A Great Biologist and His Quest for the Origins of Behaviour*, by Jonathan Weiner (Random House, $36.95).

Books
Bernard Baskin

Dr. Seymour Benzer, the scientist-hero of this engaging book, once visited his grandson's high school during lunch break. Some students stayed inside and some went outside, some leaned on their cars, some sat around their bikes, and some gathered to talk near the school's flag pole. His grandson informed him that every day the same students behaved in the same way.

Benzer is sure that despite cultural influences, there is a genetic pattern to these seemingly haphazard choices. "Genes are real and ever present. It is not random. None of it is random."

Do we inherit traits of character and forms of behavior? Are our attitudes and choices in many areas of life determined by genetic codes that developed through a long evolutionary process? How can we account for the chain of reactions, the author wonders, "that leads from a single gene to a bark, or a laugh, or a song, or a thought, or a memory, or a glimpse of red, or a turn toward a light, or a raised hand, or a raised wing?"

On a higher level, there are questions such as these: Do inherited forms of behavior include such human traits as bonding between parents and children, incest avoidance, suspicion of strangers, dominance order within groups and a division of labor between the sexes?

In Time, Love, Memory, Jonathan Weiner, Pulitzer Prize winner in the field of popular science, reports on the five years he spent with Benzer and his team at the California Institute of Technology – especially on their groundbreaking work in breeding mutant fruit flies. These minute, winged insects ("they look like nothing without a microscope") are born, reproduce and die all in the space of a month.

Through a series of creative experiments, Benzer and his team were able to breed mutant fruit flies and observe their behavior. Some of these flies deviated from normal patterns of sleep – they overslept, didn't take naps and didn't go to sleep with the other flies.

Other mutants didn't engage in the usual elaborate mating procedures but shunned female flies and danced with males instead.

It was also discovered that some flies were able to learn simple things, recognize odors and avoid a variety of dangers.

All of this is related to specific genes. What is significant, is that these genes have counterparts in mammals, including humans.

Some molecular biologists are exuberant – even cocky – about their findings. Leon Silver, for example believes that science is racing toward a climax. "Barriers to knowledge keep disappearing, one by one. I think in the end we're going to know it all, I really do. It's a question of how long, just a question of when." He is certain that inevitably, molecular biologists are going to move into psychology and take over the field.

But many other scientists are not so sure. They remain skeptical and even antagonistic. Human personality, they contend, is complex, mercurial, hard to crib or confine. Moreover, men and women are designed to react sensitively to their social environment.

Helen Epstein, professor of biology has warned, "Before blundering around in the lab with a test tube of DNA, scientists might be wise to at least try to discover more about human development and behavior first. If there are important genes to work, at least scientists will know what to look for."

Weiner gives a fair hearing to both sides of the complex nature-nurture controversy.

Benzer grew up in Brooklyn, N.Y., the son of poor immigrant parents. He received his first microscope for his bar mitzvah. Afterwards, he had nothing more to do with Hebrew school, During the High Holy Day Services, while the rest of the congregation prayed, and his father looked the other way, Seymour read the book, The Principles of Atomic Physics. As a teenager, he was influenced by Sinclair Lewis's novel Arrowsmith, the story of an idealistic scientist, who despite many obstacles, remains undeviatingly loyal to his chosen career. Benzer is eccentric, unconventional, tireless in his work, intellectually playful and boundless in his curiosity.

Time, Love, Money, is accessible to readers with little scientific background. It is well researched, enthusiastic and anecdotal. It opens a window on new and exciting findings in biology that may very well alter our entire way of life.

Is sham surgery ethical?

By RABBI CHAIM STEINMETZ

One of the mainstays of medical research is the double blind control group. Patients involved in drug studies are routinely divided into two groups, one which takes the experimental drug, and another which takes a placebo.

The results of the two groups are compared, allowing researchers to exclude external factors that may be affecting the patient, such as the psychosomatic effects of taking medicine.

In recent years, the Food and Drug Administration and National Institutes of Health have been encouraging researchers testing new surgical techniques to use control groups.

One group receives the experimental surgery, while the control group receives "sham surgeries," where they undergo a similar but useless surgical procedure.

In a recent study using fetal tissue to treat Parkinson's disease, all forty patients were operated on, and had four tiny holes drilled into their foreheads; however, only twenty of the patients received the transplant of fetal tissue, while the control group got the surgery without the transplant (NY Times, April 22, '99).

These studies raise a difficult ethical question: Is it acceptable to perform a surgery that will have no benefit for the patient?

It must be noted that as a general rule, Halachah prohibits injuring any person, including self-injury (Shulchan Aruch CM420:31). The reason for this is that the human body is a gift from God, and man has no right to injure or destroy it (Rabbi S. Z. Zevin, L'Or HaHalachah 318-338).

This prohibition does not necessarily rule out all forms of self injury. Rabbi Moshe Feinstein (Iggrot Moshe CM2:65-66) allows any sort of purposeful wounding such as plastic surgery, while others are more restrictive (Tzitz Eliezer 11:41).

Clearly, participation in a surgical study, even for the control group, could be considered a "purposeful" form of injury, and acceptable according to Halachah. However, two halachic concerns remain.

The first concern relates to the possible exaggeration of medical benefit. Dr. Arthur Caplan, director of the University of Pennsylvania Centre for Bioethics, has opposed sham surgery on the grounds that "this is going to extremes to worship at the altar of placebo controls" (Wall Street Journal, Dec. 11, '98).

Similar concerns exist in Halachah. In many cases, Jewish law prohibits autopsies. However, one may violate the Torah in order to possibly save a life. But how do you define this possibility?

Is the possibility that the doctors performing the autopsy may gain medical knowledge that could save a life in the future sufficient reason for an autopsy?

According to Rabbi Ezekiel Landau (NBYDII:201), a possible future benefit is insufficient reason to violate Halachah.

He gives the following example

Is sham surgery ethical?

to illustrate his view. A doctor is allowed to boil water, even on Shabbat, in order to sterilize his instruments for a life-saving surgery. However, this would not allow any person to boil water on Shabbat on the off chance that it may be necessary for a life-threatening surgery.

Similarly, he says that one only suspends Halachah in the face of a clear danger, not for a possible future medical benefit.

While others adopt a more liberal view of medical benefit (Mishpetei Uziel YD28), the point made by Rabbi Landau is extremely significant. Not every type of medical benefit is sufficient reason for us to override ethical concerns.

If sham surgeries become a routine method of research, researchers will no longer review each surgical study to see if it is absolutely necessary to use a control group.

A second concern has to do with proper consent. While all patients in the study sign that they consent to the sham surgery if they are picked for the control group, is a patient, desperate to try an experimental cure, giving wholehearted consent?

There is a similar concern in Halachah regarding gambling. The Talmud (Sanhedrin 24b) mentions an opinion that gambling can be considered a form of theft. According to Rashi, this is because gamblers play with the expectation that they will be winners; therefore, their consent is never a true, wholehearted consent.

While others permit gambling (Rama CM 370:63), and the interpretation of Rashi is in the minority, the concerns raised by Rashi are very real.

It is quite possible that patients will consent to sham surgery only because they are desperate for a cure. This type of consent is ethically suspect.

There is no question that there is sufficient warrant in Halachah to allow sham surgery when required. However, there are major halachic concerns about using sham surgery, and it should not be used unless absolutely necessary.

Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz is the spiritual leader of Congregation Tifereth Beth David Jerusalem in Montreal.

טורונטו קיץ 99:

טורונטו של קיץ היא עיר מדליקה,שמחה, תוססת. כאילו שכל הקור של החורף גרם להמון אנרגיה לצאת עכשיו החוצה בהתפרצות גדולה. אינני יכול לכסות את מאות האירועים שקורים פה זה אחרי זה או במקביל. רק שני טיפים קטנים של דברים שכדאי לראות.

"תה עם מוסוליני,":

ההמנון:

יש לישראל המנון יפה, שמילותיו נכתבו הרבה לפני קום המדינה ע"י נפתלי הרץ -אימבר למנגינת עם צ'כית.

"כל עוד בלבב פנימה
נפש יהודי הומיה".

והנה, עברו כמעט מאה שנה, ובישראל יש כחמישה מליון יהודים, מדינה מודרנית, גאה שהוקמת ומתעצמת. אבל מה לעשות - יש במדינה גם כמליון לא יהודים, בעיקרם ערבים. מצפים מהם שיהיו נאמנים למדינה ואזרחים טובים. אבל איך אפשר לצפות מהם לשיר המנון שמילותיו מיועדות ליהודים בלבד. והינה לפני מספר שבועות הציע חבר כנסת ערבי להחליף את ההמנון הישראלי בשיר שאיננו מיועד רק ליהודים. המעניין הוא, שהח"כ הערבי הציע שיר נפלא שכתב שאול טשרניחובסקיי, ושעוסק באחוות האדם והעמים:

"שחקי שחקי על חלומות
זה אני החולם שח,....
שחקי כי באדם אאמין
גם ברוחו, רוח עז."

המנון לא צריך לשנות בקלות, ואולי בכלל לא. אבל זה בהחלט רעיון מעניין.. ובעיקר בגלל שח"כ ערבי בחר שיר ישראלי של משורר יהודי ישראלי. אבל שישאר בינינו.

MADA service reveals diversity in Israeli life

By ORLI GOLDBERG
Special to The CJN

Life in Israel is as erratic as an irregular pulse. Like one's blood pressure, which constantly fluctuates in response to different stimuli, so too does Israeli society. The diversity I encountered as one of 36 Canadian Jewish volunteer medics for the Magen David Adom (MADA) ambulance service reflects the variance and unpredictability of Israeli life.

Diaspora Jews often experience a craving to taste the true flavor of Israel. I can personally attest to the fact that there is no better way to experience the heartbeat and circulation of Israeli society than in the back of a speeding ambulance.

I cannot describe to you a typical day in the life of a MADA volunteer, because there is no such thing as typical. So, I will simply relate a day's experience.

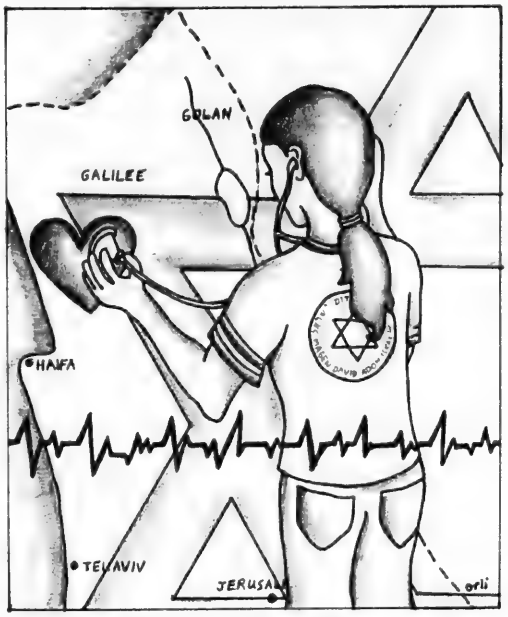
It began with a call to the Tel Aviv diamond industry district. After running up the five flights of factory stairs, we were greeted by the stern instructions of the police not to touch anything – we had arrived at the scene of a murder.

There was nothing for us to do for the victim, who was hunched over a toilet bowl with two bullet wounds in his back. So we moved on to treat the victim's employer, who, having either committed or witnessed the act, was suffering from severe shock.

Blinded by the flash of a newspaper photographer as we escorted the hysterical suspect to the ambulance, we sped away to the crowded corridors of Ichilov Hospital.

We had barely left the hospital grounds when we received our second call – an unconscious taxi driver in the haredi community of Bnei Brak. The exact address was not difficult to find, thanks to the horde of haredi children who were swarming around the patient.

By the time we arrived, the unconscious man was not breathing and had no pulse. The ambulance driver instructed our team to begin CPR.



There are no words to describe the exhilarating feeling one experiences when performing compressions and giving breaths in order to resuscitate a life. By the time the Mobile Intensive Care Unit arrived on the scene and took over, we had restored the patient's pulse, and he was even beginning to breathe independently.

Administering CPR is hard work – especially in 40-degree weather – so after that call we were in need of a break. No sooner had we finished our break than we received our next call – the all too common motorcycle accident.

It was a challenge getting through the stop-and-go traffic on the Ayalon expressway. In Israel, motorists are not eager to move over for anyone or anything – including a speeding ambulance with emergency siren blaring and flashing red lights glaring. However, we finally made it to the chaotic site of the accident.

Despite the distraction of voices cursing, arms waving and telephones ringing, we were able to ascertain the problem and treat the motorcyclist who had been hit by a car. But a scraped knee and stiff neck did not seem to be sufficient justification for the macho motorcyclist to abandon his precious motorcycle. He refused to come with us to the hospital, so we were on our way once again.

Life in an ambulance is not always life in the fast lane. We spent the next few hours improving our shesh besh (backgammon) game in the station, followed by two routine transfers of elderly people to their respective hospitals. The tedium of getting through these hours was worth it, however, because we then had a soccer game to look forward to.

Being a medic has several perks. One of them includes free field level seats at the Maccabiah stadium in Tel Aviv to be on call to treat soccer players and fans in case of an emergency.

At this HaPoel Tel Aviv vs. Betar Jerusalem game we had to be especially alert. The prime ministerial elections had just taken place, and the game had political overtones. (Everything in Israel has political overtones.)

The ultimate victory of the leftist Tel Aviv team, after an intense shoot-out, was a coup de grace in light of the recent victory of Ehud Barak (Labor party) for prime minister. Thus, although there were no injuries for us to treat during the game, our expertise as medics was necessary at the game's conclusion. The furious rightist Jerusalem fans lit the seats of the stadium on fire as a manifestation of their frustration with both crushing defeats.

Labor vs. Likud on the soccer field – a true example of politics at play.

Like the peaks and valleys on a heart-rate monitor, such are the highs and lows of a day as a volunteer ambulance medic, and such are the ups and downs of Israeli life. From my experience at MADA, I learned that even after examining the obvious signs and symptoms, life – more specifically life in Israel – remains unpredictable.

I feel fortunate to have been granted the unique opportunity of being able to feel the pulse of Israel. Irregular as it may be in rate, rhythm, and volume, the pulse of Israel will always beat intensely in my own heart.

Fears Fuel Russian Aliyah

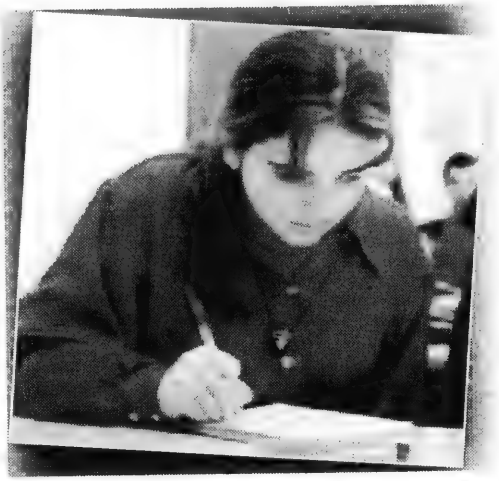
by Adi Neuberger

Anti-Semitism in Russia has reached alarming heights, causing a wave of Jewish emigration to Israel not seen since the fall of the iron curtain.

"Jews in Moscow are very scared," says Rabbi Pinchus Goldsmith, head of the city's largest synagogue in a recent interview with jewish toronto. Goldsmith, who helped revive the Choral congregation when he arrived in Moscow in 1989, says the fight against anti-Semitism is a pre-occupation of the entire Jewish community.

Since January, amidst growing fears of anti-Semitism, more than 12,000 Russian Jews (at least 60,000 Jews from the former Soviet Union are expected to arrive in Israel by the end of 1999) have been brought to Israel by the UJA Federation funded Jewish Agency – a dramatic increase of 128% over the same time last year. Jewish Agency emissaries report that Russian immigration to Israel hasn't reached such proportions since the mass exodus of the late 1980s and early 1990s.

"If the trend continues, the number of Jews from Russia alone making aliyah might reach 30,000 this year, which would be the highest total since 1992," Jewish Agency Chairman Sallai Meridor recently noted.



Some 1,500 young candidates for Jewish Agency Programs such as Selah, Chalom and Naaleh study programs in Israel are taking preparatory courses in Russia, Belarus and the Baltic States.

"Worsening economic conditions, especially in major cities such as Moscow and St. Petersburg, are fueling anti-Semitic and racist sentiments throughout the country," reports Alla Levy, Director of Jewish Agency operations in the former Soviet Union (FSU) and Eastern Europe.

Russia has seen a wave of attacks against Jewish targets recently, including bomb blasts in May near the Choral Synagogue in Moscow, where Leopold Kaminovsky was brutally stabbed last month by a 20 year-old Neo-Nazi.

"The government does nothing to condemn or deter these vicious acts so it's up to us to do whatever we can to stop them," adds Goldsmith.

A survey conducted by the Jewish Agency between March and May this year revealed that 31% of immigrants arriving in Israel via Moscow identified anit-Semitism as one of the two main reasons for having chosen to immigrate.

"You can see more and more vulnerable Jews coming out of the woodwork turning to the Jewish Agency as their only hope," notes UJA Federation Campaign 2000 Co-Chair David Engel, who recently visited the FSU. "This is most definitely an issue our local community should be concerned with and their plight places the rescue of Jews at the centre of our ongoing fundraising efforts."

Long lines at the Jewish Agency in Moscow are a daily occurrence. During the first quarter of 1999, over 10,000 Jews in Russia requested information about making aliyah.

Creating Space For Minds To Grow

A New CHAT In The Making

jewish toronto

School may be out for the summer but the (CHAT) Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto is busier than ever during the first phase of a $9 million expansion and renovation project.

An initial $3 million contribution by the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Charitable Foundation launched the long-awaited project last spring - a joint effort between CHAT and UJA Federation to accommodate its tremendous growth. A student population that has doubled in the last decade gave birth to unsightly portables which will be replaced with 21 new classrooms.

The new Wilmington Avenue Campus, to be named the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Education Centre, will also include an expanded library, a new cafeteria, a Jewish Studies Resource Centre and an athletic centre to support 30 teams competing in 12 areas of sports. The Second Phase of the project will include the incorporation of state-of-the-art computers and other modern appointments.

The new CHAT will feature a new facade, landscaping, better access and improved parking. Artist's rendering

"We're looking forward to building a facility that will properly house CHAT's growing student body," notes Howard Meyer, who is co-chairing the building committee with Norman Godfrey and has been monitoring the project daily.

"Our goal is to have the doors open in September for the beginning of the school year," adds Norman Godfrey, long-time supporter of CHAT and the Jewish community.

"Anne Tanenbaum's gift was instrumental in getting this project off the ground," explains Baila Lubek, President of CHAT's Board of Directors. "Now we need the support of other leading philanthropists who share her commitment to strengthening Jewish education."

Students cheered at the groundbreaking ceremony when they were told they would no longer be relegated to dreary portables.

UJA Federation and CHAT are focusing on raising an additional $6 million in order to complete the project by fall 2000. The partnership between the two organizations is one of many ongoing cooperative fundraising efforts being spearheaded by UJA Federation as part of the Jewish Toronto Tomorrow initiative for community development.

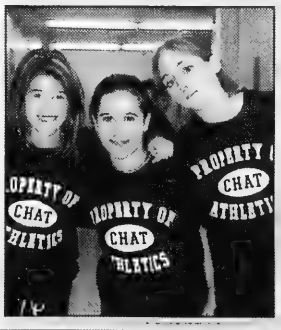
For more information about the CHAT/UJA Federation Building Together Campaign or to arrange an on-site tour of the project, call Gloria Snow at UJA Federation (416) 631-5671.

In A Class By Itself

A record number of students will be taking advantage of the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto's (CHAT) world renowned reputation next year.

Over 1120 students are expected to enroll this fall – representing a growth of 20% over last year – as the largest Jewish high school in North America marks its 40th anniversary.

"More and more teenagers are choosing to continue their Jewish education at CHAT," says Shirley Worth, Chair of UJA Federation's Board of Jewish Education. According to Worth, up to 80% of students in some of Toronto's Jewish elementary schools make their way to CHAT.

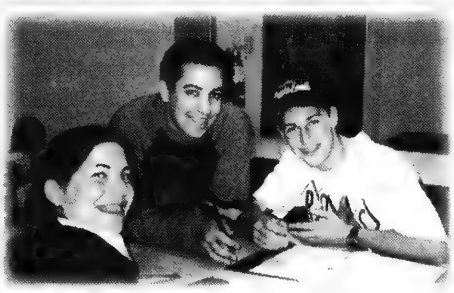


Despite outgrowing its modest two story Wilmington Avenue facility several years ago due to an expanding student body, CHAT has never compromised its educational objectives," says CHAT Headmaster Paul Shaviv.

"A highly qualified and dedicated faculty and a strong commitment and concern for each individual student have consistently been the main factors in the school's success," adds Shaviv. "The new building will only further enhance an already extremely positive atmosphere of learning."

Emphasis on academic excellence in both Judaic and general studies and a pluralistic outlook have distinguished CHAT among Jewish secondary institutions. The school has established a reputation for community service and for students with special needs as well as advanced courses. "In no other school can you find such a wide range of young men and women studying advanced Talmud – Jewish law – together in the same class," notes Shaviv. CHAT also runs a special new stream program to integrate students arriving from the public school system.

In recent years several alumni have received academic awards, including silver and gold medals from the University of Toronto's prestigious medical school. Others have become members of faculties at teaching institutions around the world.



According to Shaviv, the school, which boasts an average student retention rate of over 90% from year to year, also engenders a deep sense of camaraderie and loyalty among students – some of whom, like Josh Sable, return as staff members and educators. "Walking down the halls of CHAT is like visiting Ben Yehuda Street in Jerusalem," says Sable, who returned to CHAT to teach eight years after graduating. "The common bond that exists between each individual creates a natural sense of warmth and comfort."

"I think I have one of the most exciting jobs in Jewish education," says Shaviv. "It's very rewarding to be a part of a school that serves as a model of excellence both in terms of academic achievement and community-building."

Higher income families 'squeezed' out of system

ucation exists, he maintained. "Anytime a Jewish child is starved for a Jewish education, it's a crisis the Jewish community must deal with."

Kaye acknowledges that the Toronto Jewish community, through UJA Federation, provides approximately $7 million a year in subsidies to families who can't afford the full tuition. But in addition to schooling, he said, there are camp fees, youth groups, and synagogue and community centre memberships. All are user-pay. "It all adds up and you begin to question whether you can afford these things."

Even individuals and families in higher income brackets are being affected, he said. "Despite making good salaries, they're being squeezed out of the system."

A quick look at various costs associated with Jewish lifestyle illustrates the problem. As mentioned, day school tuition ranges from $6,000 to $12,000 per student per year.

Membership at one of North Toronto's larger Conservative shuls is more than $1,000 a couple, at a Reform Temple, it costs $2,000 for a family of four. A second Reform temple bases its dues on members' incomes, with amounts ranging from $216 to $2,976 per family. The average membership is about $1,000.

Camp Shalom charges about $2,900 per child for a four-week session, with slight discounts for siblings. Fees for Camp Ramah are $2,730 for four weeks or $4,450 for eight weeks. By comparison, Camp Couchiching, a non-profit facility with ties to the Anglican diocese, charges $835 for a two-week session.

Purchasing kosher food can also increase a family's budget beyond that of their gentile neighbors. One large supermarket with a substantial kosher food section charged $8.80 a kilo for kosher lean ground beef, $5.49 for non-kosher; $18.77 a kilo for a kosher rib steak, $15.64 for non-kosher; and $5.24 a kilo for kosher chicken drumsticks, $3.70 to $3.95 for non-kosher.

Add to that membership dues for Jewish organizations, contributions to the annual UJA campaign or for other charities, the costs of putting up a sukkah, preparing or attending seders, a brit milah ($300 on average, compared to a $150 to $200 for a medical circumcision), and the old Yiddish aphorism takes on a new meaning: S'is shver tzu zein a Yid – It's hard to be a Jew.

J. Alan Winter is professor of sociology at Connecticut College who has researched contemporary American Jewry, including the affordability of living Jewishly. Author of Not By Bread Alone and Income, Identity and Involvement in the Jewish Community, Winter believes "it's more a question of value than of cost."

Income and identity are two crucial factors in determining whether families live a Jewish lifestyle, he continued. Once the decision to "be involved" is made, then the question of funds arises.

At that point, the family must prioritize its values to determine how it will spend its discretionary, after expenses, income.

"For example, if one is more interested in VCRs, CD players and all the other wonders of the alphabet that define 'success' in America than in teaching one's children the aleph-bet, a higher income will be needed to meet the cost of living Jewishly than if the reverse is true," Winter writes.

"Therefore, it is suggested that the relationship between income and the cost of living Jewishly is dependent not only on the level of family income or discretionary funds and the cost of the specific forms of Jewish involvement in question, but also on the degree of Jewish identity."

For many in the community, Toronto's Jewish day school system is a source of tremendous pride and satisfaction. Approximately 11,000 youngsters attended Jewish day schools last year, according to Bernard Shoub, director of school finances for the Board of Jewish Education (BJE) of UJA Federation.

Of those 11,000 students, 7,000 are enrolled in schools funded to some extent by UJA Federation (several schools are independent of the UJA Federation and receive private support). Of the 7,000 youngsters, 2,700 or 40 percent receive some sort of community financial assistance, ranging from 10 to 100 percent of the tuition, Shoub said.

The subsidy determination process is an intrusive one, Shoub conceded. Families seeking tuition subsidies must fill out an extensive application form that requires full disclosure of income and assets.

It's common practice among the schools, for example, to require parents to provide the previous year's income tax return, financial statements of businesses owned by the applicants, unemployment insurance payment slips, severance letters, mortgage statements, separation or divorce agreements; they must also list all holdings, 'including real estate, stocks, bonds, cars, trucks and intangible assets; they are required to itemize loans owing; and they must provide a rundown of a family's monthly expenses, including insurance, utilities, medical expenses and vacation costs.

That sort of intensive investigation can't be avoided, Shoub said. "Unfortunately, there is only a limited amount of funds available. They want to be fair with the family and they want to be fair to the schools. It's not easy. It's a challenge."

Several people interviewed by The CJN called the subsidies interview process "humiliating." One woman was reduced to tears by it.

Shoub said interviewers are trained to be sensitive and to treat parents with dignity. The intrusive nature of the questions are necessary to ensure that only those who qualify receive funds.

"It's a thankless task," he said. "There are probably people who are paying full fee who won't expose themselves financially even though they'd be entitled to assistance."

The BJE doesn't have any hard data on the numbers who have been dissuaded from sending their children to day schools because of the process, he added.

During its inquiries, The CJN heard of people who chose not to send their children to day schools because of the high costs involved. However, only one couple agreed to go on the record to discuss their decision.

"There is anecdotal evidence that there are significant numbers of middle class families choosing not to send their children to day schools because they see the cost as prohibitive," said Arthur Landa, executive director of Associated Hebrew Schools. "If we knew who these families were, we'd at least have a starting point to begin talking to them.

"There are few people who won't agree there are a significant number of people who would avail themselves of a Jewish education if the fees are lower."

Landa, who also serves as president of the Association of Jewish Day School Administrators, said "many families don't want to go through the process of applying for a subsidy."

Every year, approximately 40 students – about two percent of Associated's 1,720 students – are withdrawn due to "changes in the family situation." School administrators are told by some that "'It's hard to sustain the family burden over [several] years," Landa said.

But, he said, "We don't know the scope of this. I don't know how many more children would be attracted to Jewish schools if tuition was not a factor."

Most of those people who make an initial inquiry about subsidies go through the interview process, despite some early hesitation, he continued. About a dozen a year express discomfort, "but at the end of the day, most will come through one way or another.

"No matter how you do this, the fact that you're going to share private and confidential information makes people uncomfortable. Some families don't want to go through it. They don't want to feel they're getting a handout from anyone," Landa said.

Low income families are less likely to show reticence, he continued. "They've come to grips with it," but families who earn larger amounts, even $90,000 a year, are more hesitant.

"There is a segment of our population, on the periphery of Jewish education, who don't identify with Jewish education as others do. They will send their children to Associated as long as they can hack it and as long as something else in their lifestyle doesn't get harmed," he said. "It has to be convenient. If it's not, they won't go the extra mile."

Camp, school, shul take chunk of famlies' funds

Six families interviewed by The CJN said they have decided to bear the costs that come with sending their children to day schools. One family, which dearly wanted to enroll their three boys in day school, decided the expenses were too great.

Gary Stoller and his wife Helaine send their two children, Bryan, 12, and Cara, 9, to Associated. Stoller, a partner in a pension and benefits consulting firm, pays the full tuition, about $15,000 per year for both children. Despite earning what he considers a good income, the family must live a modest lifestyle to make ends meet.

"I make a lot of money," he said, "but I don't have a lot of money."

"My after-tax income barely covers my expenses. I pay a lot of tax. If you add up the mortgage, house costs, food, Hebrew day school, music lessons, swimming lessons, other lessons, Jewish summer camp...

"When I add up all my expenses, I need $90,000 to $100,000 after tax to pay for everything. That's a lot of money."

Stoller said he does top up his RRSP each year, but that's the extent of the family's annual investments.

In addition to tuition costs, the Stollers spend between $7,000 and $8,000 to send both kids to camp. That amount covers camp fees and other associated costs, like extra clothing, sleeping bags and other items, he said. "The list goes on and on."

Wayne Levin

The family's annual membership dues at the Adath Israel come to more than $1,700 a year, which includes a contribution to the shul's building fund.

The Stollers are also planning a bar mitzvah next year, which will cost thousands. Stoller acknowledges that much of the cost will go for a party that is not required by Jewish tradition. But he and Helaine don't think they can scrimp on the celebration.

"Our feeling is that Bryan would feel left out if all his friends have bar mitzvah parties and he doesn't...I'll have to go into my line of credit and pay it off next year," Stoller said.

Additional costs this year are gifts for Bryan's friends who are also celebrating their bar mitzvahs.

With all those expenses, the Stollers get by by cutting back in other areas.

"We don't take nice vacations. Our house has never been painted."

Stoller drives a nine-year-old car, his wife, a six-year-old vehicle. The living room is unfurnished. "We would like to fix up the house, but there isn't the money to pay for it," he said.

Stoller knows of couples who have taken their children out of day schools because they couldn't afford it. With the first child, he said, "they can handle it, but with the second child, it sometimes gets to be too much."

"I'm not complaining," he said. "It's a choice we've made."

Stoller directs his frustration at the government of Ontario. Like other Jewish parents, he's angry he must bear a financial burden that his Roman Catholic neighbors who send their children to religious schools do not.

"I think the current situation is morally repugnant and racist," he said.

That's a view strongly shared by Wayne Levin. Levin is a spokesperson for Parents for Educational Choice (PEC), a grass-roots organization that lobbies for day school funding.

"It's a burden we shouldn't have to face," Levin said. The father of three children aged seven, four and six months, Levin is anticipating tuition fees of $24,000 a year by the time his youngest enters school.

"When you couple that with the recognition that many of my neighbors get the equivalent [religious] education without a red cent coming out of their pockets, that hurts," he said.

Levin owns his own management consulting business, and his wife Debbie works as a manager in a Canadian Tire store. They're budgeting for tuition fees of $11,000 next year – $7,500 for full day at Netivot HaTorah and $3,500 for a half day of junior kindergarten.

Like the Stollers, the Levins are cutting back in other areas. "We don't take big vacations...and we've delayed for some years the purchase of a new car....Every time we think of a major purchase, we are constantly reminded of this inequity."

Debbie Levin is qualified as a teacher and two years ago was offered a job in that profession. It's something she'd love to do, but taking a teaching position would lower the couple's income – something they can't afford to do at this point, Levin said.

Miles Bocknek is a self-employed businessman who runs a small company. All three of his children, aged nine, seven and four, attend Jewish day schools. One is at She'Arim with tuition of $12,000. The others are at Eitz Chaim. He pays $7,500 for full-time attendance for one and $3,500 for 2½ days a week. Tuition this past year totalled $23,000.

Bocknek suggested that people who earn $60,000 a year, who would be considered middle class, would face serious problems coming up with $23,000 for school tuition.

Bocknek pays $15,000 out of that sum out of his own pocket; the rest of his children's tuition is subsidized by the community.

Like Levin and Stoller, Bocknek is angry at the government of Ontario for his plight.

"It's upsetting that other Ontarians receive full funding for the right religious environment for their children and that the government is taking our tax money and not spending it on my children. I'm not happy with that."

Bocknek said the family copes by cutting back in other areas. "We have no living-room or dining-room furniture. The couch and love seat in the family room are the ones we received as wedding gifts 12 years ago."

Their lifestyle is modest. "It's food, visa bill, property taxes, school, car expenses and that's it. There's no room for anything...We don't take fancy vacations."

"We're not poor, impoverished people, but it hurts."

Although they are a two-income family – his wife, Jackie Blaff, is a lawyer – "the schools just zap away" any extra money, he said.

Public school is not an option for the family, he continued. "We're living an Orthodox lifestyle" and sending their children to Jewish day school is an important part of that, he said.

"It's a humongous sacrifice, but even if it wasn't, it's not right," he said, noting that the provincial government subsidizes both poor and affluent Roman Catholic families who send their children to religious schools.

Brian celebrates a special bar mitzvah at age 21

By ELIANA SCHNEIDER
Special to The CJN

UTTERSON, Ont. — The night before his bar mitzvah at Camp Ramah in Canada, Brian David couldn't sleep. He tossed and turned for hours and when early morning came, he woke up his counsellor.

"He hugged me and told me to get ready," says counsellor Michael Kotzer. "He didn't want me to be late for his bar mitzvah."

Brian had been waiting 21 years for this occasion.

As a camper in Tikvah – Ramah's summer program for young people with special needs – Brian's big day came in early July when he was called to the Torah in front of some 500 campers, staff and family members. It was the first Tikvah bar mitzvah ever celebrated at Camp Ramah, situated in the Muskoka region of Ontario.

Brian's family wanted him to have a bar mitzvah when he was 13, but several members of their Toronto Jewish community advised his parents against it.

"We were told that no one would want to come to his bar mitzvah," says Paula David, Brian's mother. "Or, people would only come to see if Brian could actually do it."

But as a camper at Ramah since 1993 – when the Tikvah program began – Brian, 21, feels welcome here.

"This is where Brian got his Jewish identity," says his mother. "What better place to have his bar mitzvah than where we have so many people who care so much about him?"

During a weekday Shacharit service, campers and staff were teary-eyed when Brian, who has Down syndrome, lifted the Torah from the Ark. Several staff had grown up with him at camp and knew how hard he had worked for this moment.

Brian practised for months for the aliyah, both with his family and counsellors. After completing it, he pumped his fists into the air triumphantly.

Clad in a new tallit, kippah, a colorful polo shirt and white pants, he beamed. "I was happy and excited," says Brian.

His friends and family gathered around him after the ceremony to offer hugs and congratulations.

"Brian was smiling so big I thought his head would explode," says Yoni Skupsky, his counsellor.

Several campers in the Tikvah program participated in the ceremony. Some led prayers, while one young woman read from the Torah.

"I was so proud of him," says Ryan Saunders, a fellow camper in the Tikvah program. "When he lifted the Torah, he was so great."

While other campers have celebrated bar and bat mitzvahs at Ramah, none had taken place in a camp-wide ceremony.

"We felt it was a special opportunity for everyone to participate in," says camp director, Rabbi Mitch Cohen.

The bar mitzvah was a "levelling experience," says Tikvah director, Dr. Mitch Parker. "It helped people focus on similarities and not differences."

For Brian, like several Tikvah members, camp was the first place he was able to develop his own identity outside of his family. Unfortunately, a lack of funding and housing limits the Tikvah program to only four weeks each summer.

"Brian never wants to leave camp," his mother adds. "He really did become a man at Ramah."

91-year-old celebrates his bar mitzvah

Albert State

By MOURA WOLPERT
CJN Correspondent

HAMILTON — At 91, Albert State may well be Canada's oldest bar mitzvah. Perhaps even the oldest one this century, or even, he adds with a chuckle, "the oldest one of this millenium."

Born in Poland, he came to Canada with his family in 1911. Growing up in St. Thomas, Ont., where there were not enough Jews for a minyan, no meeting hall, not even a Torah, he was unable to have a bar mitzvah, State told The CJN in a recent interview at his home.

Nevertheless, he grew up in an Orthodox home. When his grandfather came over from Poland, he taught the boy to lay tfillin. His Jewish education continued while his grandfather was with them, he said. And then, "I got caught up with life,with my career."

He attended the University of Western Ontario in London, became a high school English teacher, first in Simcoe, then in South Porcupine, near Timmins, and from 1945, at Westdale Collegiate in Hamilton. He married Millie, a Torontonian, and together they raised three children.

Judaism was always important to him, said State. In Hamilton, he joined and became actively involved in the community and Temple Anshe Sholom, where he served as president. Millie became equally active in Jewish organizations.

But as his 91st birthday approached, he realized that there had always been something missing in his life.

"Seven times 13 equals 91," he explained, and since a bar mitzvah must be reckoned in "multiples of 13"– the time was right at last to have his bar mitzvah.

It was a very important ceremony, he said, although, he admitted, "not completely free of tensions."

All his life he had not only taught others, but had also been an accomplished actor and director with, and ultimately president of, the Hamilton Player's Guild, one of Canada's oldest amateur theatre companies.

And now he had to learn a new portion and learn to chant it, which was not easy, he confessed, and perform it before congregation, friends and family.

"Everybody knows me as a professional," and besides, he added, "I had to live up to my standards."

He was coached by Anshe Sholom Religious School principal, Laura Wolfson, who also called him up to the Torah.

Thanks to a story in the Hamilton Spectator, about 200 guests showed up instead of the 75 or so maximum, the States thought would come. As well, he received cards and letters from former students, friends and colleagues dating back to Simcoe High School (1936-1942) and Westdale.

"What I thought would be a modest and unassuming – almost private – celebration," wrote State in his thank-you note, "turned out to be an event of general interest … It "was a humbling and yet at the same time an inspiring experience."

Still remarkably active, State teaches a continuing education course for retired professionals at the University of West Palm Beach in Florida, where the couple spend the winter months.

Round-dancing enthusiasts since his retirement in 1973, Al and Millie continue to enjoy their hobby. They are also keen theatregoers who attend "everything that's on," both in Florida and at the Shakespeare and Shaw festivals, he said.

By now, you will have heard ad nauseum about the significance of the moves within the recent cabinet shuffle. But with that old saw as my guide ("Ya know, the one about the elephant and the Jewish problem?"), it is worth taking a look at what this shuffle means for the Jewish community.

One of the major spins generated by the pundits suggests a "kinder and gentler Chrétien government." With the addition of Maria Minna and Elinor Caplan, the left-leaning element of the Cabinet has received an important boost. This, the argument continues, is especially the case regarding Minna, who will be responsible for CIDA – the international development arm of Foreign Affairs.

However, the argument concludes, this is almost beside the point because it is around the cabinet table in discussions on social issues that their voices will be heard – even if the discussions concern social policy issues not directly related to their portfolios.

The Jewish community stands to benefit from increased social and health-care spending. Due to previous budget cuts, federations across the country are absorbing huge new costs for the care of the Jewish poor, the elderly and the invalid. Unfortunately, increased social and health-care spending is most unlikely.

First, all the economic ministries have remained in conservative hands. It is extremely unlikely that Paul Martin, Jim Peterson, Jane Stewart and John Manley will consider any substantial boost in social spending.

Second, the provinces direct most social and health-care spending. Alberta, Ontario, Nova Scotia, Quebec, Manitoba and New Brunswick have all indicated a determination to maintain and even further reduce public expenditures in these areas.

In fact, there is a tax-cut rebellion brewing, led by the provincial premiers. For the government to now allocate new monies to social spending instead of offering a substantial tax reduction would be about the only thing the Liberals could do to jeopardize their lock on 24 Sussex Dr. As much as Jean Chrétien would like to leave a legacy (like universal child care) whenever he exits public life, he is too much the partisan to embark on that path at the expense of the Liberal's future electoral fortunes.

Health

Life expectancy reported to be on the rise

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — People of 65 in average health can look forward to living another 20 years, said Andrea Sturk, Bernard Betel Centre director of programs.

Life expectancy has increased to such an extent that by 2014, one in four Canadians will be 65 or older – double the present rate, she told the Association of Jewish Seniors (AJS).

At the same time, the federal government now defines seniors, for some purposes, as those over age 50, and is studying dropping it to 45, Sandra Kerr, Ryerson Polytechnic University director of programs, told those attending the program entitled To Our Good Health, at Earl Bales Park Community Centre.

In September, Ryerson will begin the first online seniors lifelong learning education program in Canada, Kerr said.

Unemployment is now a problem for people age 45 to 55 who are out of work because of downsizing, she said, adding that the federal government is funding a program to help people over 45 to find jobs.

A highlight at Earl Bales was a demonstration of tai chi by a group of volunteers led by Allaister Cooper, who invited the seniors to do some of the simpler exercises when the demonstration concluded, which they did with gusto.

People who do tai chi regularly develop bigger feet and may even grow taller, Cooper said.

One woman volunteer said tai chi had helped her to recover from a mastectomy, while another said that after five years of tai chi she was free of Parkinson disease.

It is important for seniors to engage in some pleasurable activity even if they have to look back to remember what they liked to do, said Anne Balaban, a motivational psychologist.

As an example, she said two women now singing in a choir at Baycrest had not done any singing for 20 years.

It is also important, she said, to have a way to deal with stress.

"How do you handle a daughter-in-law you don't like? How do you treat grandchildren who rub you the wrong way? How do you handle relations with your mate? These are the answers that will show how you handle stress, which is unavoidable today."

Balaban suggested that each senior set aside a half-hour as worry time in the afternoon, so that the worries will not surface at night and prevent a good night's sleep. Instead, she suggested that seniors think of five things they are grateful for before going to bed.

The program was co-sponsored by the Ontario Coalition of Senior Citizens Organization.

Entertainment was provided by Don Wackley and Reta Duenisch-Turner.

Bea Levis, Anne Schlifer and Evelyn Shulman, co-chairs of AJS, took part.

Proper eating essential for diabetics

By EILEEN GOLTZ
Special to The CJN

A few weeks ago, I knew next to nothing about diabetes. Then out of the blue, one of my son's best friends was rushed to the hospital where, if not for the quick action of his parents and doctors, he could have died.

I asked Aaron's mom how and what I could safely feed him when he was at our house, and she gave me a crash course on diabetes and a huge list of "yes and no" foods.

I quickly realized that the things I learned would be beneficial for anyone who has children (or falls into a high-risk category) to know.

The most important fact is that diabetes is a chronic disease that has no cure. Having diabetes means that major changes in lifestyle and diet are mandatory if the disease is to be kept under control.

Diabetes can be devastating if not diagnosed and treated. Many people only become aware that they have diabetes when they develop one of its serious complications like blindness, kidney disease, nerve disease or heart disease, or they have a stroke.

Diabetes is a disease in which the body does not produce or properly use insulin, a hormone that is needed to convert sugar, starches and other food into energy. The cause of diabetes is unknown, although both genetics and environmental factors, such as obesity and lack of exercise, appear to play roles. There are two major types of diabetes:

Type 1 diabetes is an autoimmune disease in which the body does not produce any insulin. This type of diabetes most often occurs in children and young adults. People with Type 1 diabetes must take daily insulin injections. This type of diabetes accounts for about five to 10 percent of cases.

Type 2 diabetes is a metabolic disorder resulting from the body's inability to make enough, or to properly use, insulin. This is the most common form of the disease, and accounts for 90 to 95 percent of cases.

Siblings of people with Type 1 diabetes and children of parents with Type 1 diabetes are at greater risk for that type of diabetes. Those at a greater risk for Type 2 diabetes are people over age 45, people with a family history of diabetes, people who are overweight, people who do not exercise, women who had gestational diabetes (which occurs in two to five percent of all pregnancies), or women who have had a baby weighing nine pounds or more at birth.

Warning signs for Type 1 diabetes include frequent urination, unusual thirst, extreme hunger, unusual weight loss, extreme fatigue and irritability. These symptoms should send you running to the doctor for a test.

For Type 2 diabetes you should look for any of the Type 1 symptoms, as well as frequent infections, blurred vision, cuts or bruises that are slow to heal, tingling or numbness in the hands or feet, or recurring skin, gum or bladder infections. Sometimes, however, people with Type 2 diabetes have no symptoms.

Aaron is spending several days with us next week while his parents attend a conference. I sent out an SOS to several of my most knowledgeable cooking buddies to ask for diabetic recipes. I needed recipes that I could use while he stays with us, as well as recipes to help Aaron and his family adjust to the lifestyle changes that are needed when someone in the family is diagnosed with diabetes.

As usual, my friends came through with flying colors. Not only are the recipes tasty enough to serve to anyone anytime, they are all diabetic friendly. Some of the recipes came with exchanges (the scale of checks and balances by which a diabetic determines the right kinds and amounts of foods to eat), some didn't.

Syrian minister slams Arafat over peace talks

By DOUGLAS DAVIS
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

LONDON — Syrian anger at the Palestinian leadership erupted into a full-frontal assault when Syrian Defence Minister Mustafa Tlas called Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat the "son of 60,000 whores."

The outburst by the veteran Syrian minister came during an address last week at Ras al-Ain, in the Bekaa Valley of eastern Lebanon, during a ceremony marking Syrian and Lebanese Army Day.

London-based Arabic newspapers deleted the expletives from their headlines this week as they reported the stream of abuse hurled by Tlas.

Referring to Arafat, Tlas exclaimed: "You son of 60,000 whores. You should not have been so cowardly and submissive at the White House.

"You should have said that Jerusalem is the unified capital of the future Palestinian state. But you just stood there like a black cat and didn't dare say a word, either about Palestine or about Jerusalem."

Tlas went on to compare Arafat to a stripper. "In his concessions to Israel, Yasser Arafat resembles a striptease dancer who removes more of her clothing whenever she ascends the stage," he said.

"Look at him when he is on stage. He moves from concession to concession like the stripper, except that she becomes more beautiful with every layer she removes, while Yasser Arafat becomes uglier."

Spokespersons for Arafat have not replied to the outburst, with one aide telling the London-based daily al-Quds al-Arabi that Arafat believes "the best response is not to respond."

However, one of Arafat's ministers, Hassan Asfour, said Tlas' behavior was disgraceful and that Syrian President Hafez al-Assad should "sack him immediately."

Tlas' remarks were also condemned by Israeli Arab legislator Azmi Beshara, who was visiting Damascus.

In a statement last Tuesday to the official Syrian news agency SANA, Tlas acknowledged that he had criticized the "policy of negligence" pursued by Arafat since the signing of the 1993 Oslo accord, but he denied uttering "any obscene or improper word against him personally."

Arabic papers, however, noted that his speech had been filmed by local and international media.

Analysts believe that two recent developments could have upset Damascus and triggered the caustic comments.

The first was the warm and politically loaded reception given by Arafat in the Gaza Strip last week to Sumer Assad, nephew of the Syrian leader and son of former Syrian vice-president Rifa'at Assad.

The second was Arafat's reconciliation in Cairo this week with the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine, a senior member of the Damascus-based Palestinian rejectionist front, which is united in its opposition to Arafat's leadership and to the Oslo peace process.

Ever since he launched the Oslo process with Israel, Arafat has been persona non grata in Damascus, where Hafez Assad hosts several militant Palestinian groups.

Sumer Assad, who has extensive media interests in Britain and France, is perceived as a potential rival for succession to Hafez Assad's son Bashar.

Sumer Assad's visit to Gaza has been perceived as a challenge to the authority of his uncle.

It was also seen as a challenge to Bashar Assad, who is reportedly having difficulty mastering the leadership skills he will need to succeed his father, who is said to be in poor health.

No official explanation was given when Hafez Assad dismissed his brother Rifa'at in February 1998 as one of three Syrian vice-presidents, but the dismissal effectively ended Rifa'at's aspirations to succeed his brother.

There are suggestions that Hafez Assad sought to weaken his brother in the event of a struggle for succession between second-generation members of the family – particularly between Bashar and Sumer.

Relations between Hafez Assad and Arafat appear to have taken a turn for the worse since the election of Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Barak.

Assad reportedly rejected appeals by Arafat to meet and coordinate their approaches to Israel in advance of peace talks with Barak.

The Palestinian leader is reported to be concerned that renewed negotiations between Israel and Syria would leave him isolated and sideline the Israeli-Palestinian negotiating track.

Syria, however, insists that it was Arafat who first broke ranks with other Arab parties by signing the 1993 Oslo accord with Israel – a move, say Syrian officials, that severely weakened the negotiating position of Damascus.

Armed supporters of PA chairman Yasser Arafat marched through Ramallah last week, their guns blazing, to protest the harsh remarks by Syrian Defence Minister Mustafa Tlas against Arafat.

European Jews: Is there a renaissance?

This has happened in Poland, in the Czech Republic and Slovakia, in Hungary, in Bulgaria – even in the countries of the former Yugoslavia.

Hundreds of thousands, meanwhile, have immigrated to Israel and elsewhere from the former Soviet Union. This includes at least 70,000 Jews who have immigrated to Germany, radically changing the face of the Jewish community there.

Hundreds of thousands have also stayed in Russia, Ukraine and other countries, and have reopened synagogues and schools and rebuilt communal structures.

"Jewish communities in the region are throwing off the mantle of 'remnant' like a garment that no longer fits," says Edward Serotta, an American photographer and writer who has documented Jewish communities in eastern and central Europe since the mid-1980s.

"We've been calling them last Jews, but they're not acting like last Jews – with kindergartens, summer camps, schools, youth programs and even Web sites on the Internet," he says.

The impact of these changes has extended beyond the former Communist states.

The emergence of newly active Jewish communities in the east, combined with the development of a new vision of a pluralistic Europe freed of artificial east-west frontiers, has created new opportunities, conditions and challenges for European Jewry in general.

The new freedoms have opened up a world of choices. And the outcome of these choices is still far from clear.

Jews in former Communist states may be throwing off the mantle of remnant, but it is still too early to predict whether the momentum of what many call a Jewish renaissance will carry through into the 21st century.

Indeed, much of the support and infrastructure for Jewish revival in former Communist states has been, and still is, funded by foreign institutions such as the Ronald S. Lauder Foundation, the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee and Chabad Lubavitch.

Not only that.

"Jews in Europe today are, first and foremost, voluntary Jews, their continued presence in European societies demonstrates a conscious personal commitment," says Paris-based historian Diana Pinto.

Pinto, in fact, espouses an optimistic vision of a Jewish future in Europe, one that links Jewish development with the development of post-Cold War civil society across the continent.

This vision was celebrated at the end of May, when nearly 600 Jews from 39 countries converged on Nice, France, for the first general assembly of the European Council of Jewish Communities.

Even in the "new" Europe, the neo-Nazis find their supporters such as these in Germany. [RNS photo]

"We are here to celebrate the pride and optimism of being Jews in Europe and being European Jews," Council chair Ruth Zilkha told the meeting.

"We are committed to building an exciting Jewish life as part of a new democratic and pluralistic Europe," she said. "We are at a very special moment of creation and vision."

Looming in the background, however, were dire predictions from pessimists like British Jewish scholar Bernard Wasserstein, who articulated his negative vision of the European Jewish future in Vanishing Diaspora, a controversial book published three years ago.

Citing drastically negative demographic statistics, thanks to a combination of assimilation, falling birth rates and mass emigration from the former Soviet Union, Wasserstein dismisses the idea of a European Jewish renaissance.

He disputes the European Council's claim that three million Jews live in Europe. He puts the total at two million and falling.

Within a generation or two, Wasserstein glumly predicts, "here and there pockets of ultra-Orthodox Jews, clinging to the tenets of the faith, will no doubt survive – a picturesque remnant like the Amish in the United States."

Jews in Europe, both east and west, have a bitter and frustrated awareness of the looming, unresolved challenges that may hamper Jewish development both within individual communities and in the world at large.

How to deal with the divisions among Orthodox, non-Orthodox and secular Jews? How to make Judaism a relevant choice in today's ideological marketplace? How to approach the high intermarriage rate and the resulting question of who is or can be considered a Jew? Is it possible to adopt a Jewish identity in mid-life? Should intermarriage be seen as a bridge or a barrier? How to confront the crisis in Jewish leadership, on local, national and Europe-wide levels?

How, too, to deal with the changing relationship between Israel and the Diaspora? And how to address the mounting claims by emerging Jewish communities in eastern Europe to play a full role on the Jewish world stage?

These are, in fact, many of the same questions that face Jews in already democratic, pluralistic, borderless America. But European Jews face them against a different historical and physical backdrop.

Two-thirds of Europe's Jews were killed in the Holocaust, destroying centuries-old communities and traumatizing those Jews who chose to remain – and their children.

The east-west post-war divide effectively and artificially cut off eastern European Jews from the rest of the Jewish world. Indeed, Jews from these countries – including those who have immigrated to Germany and Israel – often have to learn more than prayers, holidays, customs and Hebrew. They must also frequently learn the sense of collective memory and connection that even secular Jews in the west tend to grow up with.

Many Jews in former Communist Europe still maintain what Polish sociologist Pawel Spiewak describes as an "idle" Jewish identity: they are aware of their Jewish identity, but for whatever reason, they are not interested in deepening or admitting it.

This is strikingly evident in Hungary, whose Jewish population is estimated at anywhere between 54,000 and 130,000.

Like other countries in the region, Hungary has experienced a visible Jewish revival. Still, only about 6,000 Jews, most of them elderly, formally belong to the Jewish religious community. And only about 20,000 Jews are estimated to have even a tenuous contact with any sort of Jewish activity or institution.

Jews active in community work warn that the momentum of the current Jewish revival may be endangered unless new, younger leaders are prepared to take up the reins, and efforts are made to encourage continuing Jewish involvement.

Increasingly, international Jewish organizations are establishing training programs for teachers, lay leaders and fundraisers.

The European Council of Jewish Communities promotes cross-border contacts, keeps track of new e-mail links and Jewish community Web sites, and helps arrange seminars and other activities, including international singles weekends.

But will this be enough?

Experts say critical mass for Jewish continuity in former Communist Europe may not be achieved until the children of today's emerging Jewish generations come of age.

This is the first in an occasional series about post-Communist Europe 10 years after the fall of the Berlin Wall. The series will explore the changes and challenges gripping European Jewry at this critical time in history.

Aug. 2

• Justice Minister Yossi Beilin, went to court to seek the extradition of Samuel Sheinbein, an American teenager with Israeli citizenship, who is wanted in Maryland on murder charges. The request is the first test of the new law that seeks to facilitate the extradition of Israelis with tenuous connections to the state if they are wanted in foreign criminal cases.

Aug. 3

• Beilin, one of the chief architects of the Oslo agreement called the Palestinian Authority's insistence on immediate implementation of the Wye accord a mistake. Fretting over the details of the Wye accord would only make it more difficult to achieve a final status agreement, Beilin said.

Aug. 4

• After two Jews were shot and wounded in Hebron, Prime Minister Ehud Barak said, "The war on terrorism takes precedence over everything else."

• The family of Adolph Eichmann is reportedly seeking the memoirs he wrote in prison before he was hanged in Israel in 1962. Since Eichmann's execution, the manuscript has been stored in Israel's national archives.

Aug. 5

• The Knesset approved five new cabinet ministers, bringing the number to 23. The newest ministers are: Amnon Lipkin-Shahak, Centre party, Tourism; Chaim Oron, Meretz, Agriculture; Matan Vilna'i, One Israel, Science; Rabbi Michael Melchior, One Israel, Diaspora Relations and Social Affairs; and Yuli Tamir, a professor who helped found the Peace Now movement, Absorption. Tamir becomes the second woman in the cabinet.

• Ha'aretz reported that a personal envoy of Barak, Brig.-Gen. (Res.) Yitzhak Segev, met recently with Yasser Arafat to try to establish a private channel of contact and to resolve disputes over implementing the Wye accords.

Barak gets warm welcome in Moscow

By LEV KRICHEVSKY
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

Top Russian officials gave Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Barak a warm welcome during his 24-hour trip to Moscow last week.

Along with Russian President Boris Yeltsin's first public condemnation of the recent wave of anti-Semitic attacks, Russia's desire to play a more prominent role in the Middle East and the transfer of Russian missile technology to Iran also dominated Barak's visit.

Opinion

Barak's meetings, which inincluded talks with former Prime Minister Sergei Stepashin and Foreign Minister Igor Ivanov, in addition to those with Yeltsin, also touched on Russia's interest in Israeli technology and goods.

But just as important as the subjects discussed was the tone of the Russian reception, which was more positive than it had been under the reign of Barak's predecessor, Benjamin Netanyahu.

Russian media have noted that the Kremlin views Barak more warmly than it did Netanyahu, and Russian leaders told Barak that his victory opened the door to a compromise in the Middle East peace process.

Along with the United States, Russia is a co-sponsor of the peace process started in Madrid in 1991, although internal economic problems and tensions with Israel have diminished its role.

But this year, Russia has dramatically increased its political activity in the region. Barak's visit, which also included a dinner with Russian Jewish leaders sponsored by the Russian Jewish Congress, was the fourth official trip to Moscow by a high-ranking Israeli delegation this year. Russia also hosted Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat in April and Syrian President Hafez al-Assad in July.

Russian media reports stressed the importance of Barak's visit, and Yeltsin officially received Barak, an honor never bestowed on Netanyahu.

And the talks between the two leaders lasted longer than protocol required, according to a Kremlin spokesman.

But despite the good feelings, differences remain between the two countries, including Russia's arms transfers to Iran, as well as Russian cooperation with Tehran and Baghdad in the areas of ballistic and nuclear weapons.

Russia has repeatedly denied that it violated any international nonproliferation treaties, but Stepashin vowed to co-operate with Israel on the nuclear weapons issue.

"It is not in Russian interests to let any country, including Iran, get possession of nuclear arms," Stepashin said.

He promised to investigate all possible leaks of technologies to Iran.

In his meetings, Barak appealed to the Russian leadership to combat the recent rise in anti-Semitic violence.

Barak also touched on an issue that had previously escaped media attention – the fate of several Israelis kidnapped recently in Russia's troubled northern Caucasus region.

Barak did not specify how many such cases are known to Israeli officials.

Torontonian helps monitor human rights in Israel

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

JERUSALEM – For Heather Lang, a Torontonian living in Israel, human rights is not merely an abstract notion.

Lang, a graduate of Carleton University and McGill specializing in international relations, is a staff member of B'Tselem, the Israeli Information Center for Human Rights in the Occupied Territories.

Financed in Israel by the New Israel Fund and individual donors, B'Tselem monitors, documents and advocates the advancement of human rights in the territories.

Founded a decade ago by a group of public figures, academics, lawyers, journalists and Knesset members, B'Tselem has published more than 60 reports on a vast array of human rights issues.

Mainly concerned with monitoring Israel's infringement of Palestinians' human rights, B'Tselem also audits similar violations by the Palestinian Authority.

Working out of B'Tselem's office in Israel's capital, Lang, 25, wears many hats. She is an administrator, researcher, press release writer, editor and web master.

And on occasion, she accompanies field workers to the West Bank and Gaza Strip and conducts interviews there.

"I arrived at B'Tselem through an overseas placement with the Youth International Internship Program, which is supported by Canada's Department of Foreign Affairs," explained Lang. "My placement was co-ordinated by an international NGO (non-governmental organization) based in Canada called Human Rights Internet."

Lang, the daughter of Eric and Sharon, could have accepted a job just about anywhere in the world, but chose Israel for personal reasons.

"My Jewish background and Zionist education taught me to love Israel unconditionally," she said. As a result, she visited Israel and enrolled in the Hebrew University's one-year program for overseas students.

As a child, Lang studied at the Bialik Hebrew Day School, spent summers at Camp Shalom and was a participant of the Canadian Zionist Federation's Israel Dimensions trip.

Joining B'Tselem about a year ago, Lang was exposed to Palestinian Arabs for really the first time.

"I had never visited a Palestinian home," she said. "I was sheltered from the unjust actions and policies that our Arab neighbors are subjected to by the Israeli military, border police and General Security Service (Shin Bet).

Heather Lang

"Though I was familiar with Israel's security concerns, I was sheltered from the means by which they translate into discriminatory laws and practices."

Israel, she said, uses a variety of methods to maintain control of the territories: torture and moderate physical pressure in interrogations; severe restrictions on freedom of movement; administrative detentions without charges or trial for up to six months; land confiscation; demolition of homes; and settlement expansion.

For its part, she said, the Palestinian Authority has imposed restrictions on the press, conducted grossly unfair trials, practised torture resulting in deaths under detention, and rounded up suspects for prolonged arbitrary arrest.

Having accompanied B'Tselem field workers to the West Bank and Gaza Strip to collect testimonies, Lang has been stripped of her illusions.

"These experiences have profoundly shaped my understanding of human rights issues in the region," she said. "My visits to West Bank villages and the Gaza Strip exposed me to a level of poverty that has no equivalent in Israel. Yet more disturbing is the blatant discrimination which inhibits Palestinians from enjoying the same resources and entitlements as Israeli Jews."

Citing water as an example, Lang said that western Jerusalem, inhabited almost exclusively by Jews, scarcely has been affected by the current drought.

Yet in the West Bank, public wells have reached unseasonably low levels. "Many Palestinians do not have enough water for their basic household needs, which presents serious health risks."

Lang, who speaks Hebrew and has a basic understanding of Arabic, said that her exposure to the human rights situation in the territories has been an eye-opener.

"It has definitely modified my view of Israel, making me more critical than the average North American Jew living here.

"It is not easy being an internal advocate in Israeli society, reminding people of what they often know but don't want to hear.

"Many people in Israel cannot comprehend how it is that a Jew would move to Israel with the objective of helping the Palestinians. Yet I believe that, as a people having experienced a history of persecution, we could benefit from monitoring our own behavior towards those less fortunate than ourselves."

Caplan gets cabinet post

Her goals in her new position include ensuring "that we have policies in place that will help us value and be proud of our Canadian citizenship.

"We have to talk about how important our citizenship is to us. I think Canadians need to be reminded of the fact that this is a land of immigrants and that immigrants have built this country," she said.

"Immigrants bring great prosperity and we need to have people from around the world who want to come and build a better life for themselves and, in the process, a better life for all of us and our children and future generations.

"We want to make sure that our laws will achieve these goals," she said.

"I've seen what people with determination and intelligence and a desire to build a better life were able to achieve for my family," said Caplan, now a grandmother herself.

"I think that's the story of most Canadian families, whether the immigrants are recent or further down on the family tree."

"We believe she'll be a most capable minister," said Michael Briks, executive vice-president of Jewish Immigrant Aid Services (JIAS). "We're looking forward to working with her."

JIAS has worked with Caplan's predecessor, Lucienne Robillard, and others in the ministry.

"[They] were certainly attentive to the issues we thought were of concern, especially for the welfare of the Jewish people in the former Soviet Union and other areas that were oppressive for the Jewish people," Briks said.

JIAS is hopeful that Caplan will respond favorably to its recommendations and to the concerns of other non-governmental organizations to the best of her ability, he added.

As MP for Thornhill, Caplan has dealt with many immigration issues over the past two years.

What struck her, she said, was that she received more calls from people offering help for Kosovar refugees than she did negative comments. "That made me very proud."

IDF to encourage Arab enlistment

By AMOS HAREL
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The IDF human resources branch is working on a plan to encourage Israeli Arab citizens to volunteer for military service.

According to the plan, recruiters will operate openly in Israeli Arab towns, conducting intensive campaigns in local schools.

Once the plan is completed, it will be presented to Deputy Chief of Staff Uzi Dayan and then to the chief of staff, the prime minister and the defence minister for approval.

"We are still debating what is the right way to do this, but we are clearly talking about volunteering for full military service, not for national service," a senior IDF officer said last weekend.

Currently, the army conducts limited, low-profile activity with respect to recruiting Arab volunteers for military service. In several Arab settlements, army officials approach local political leaders, and if these approaches are met with approval, preliminary contacts are made with school principals. But most of the Arabs currently enlisting in the army do so on their own initiative and contact the army themselves.

Under the new plan, recruiters would operate openly in Arab neighborhoods, in the hope of encouraging relatively widespread conscription.

"The defence establishment has a clear interest in encouraging Christian and Muslim volunteers to join the army, for two reasons," the senior IDF official said. "First, we believe that as high as possible a number of Israeli citizens must serve in the army. Secondly, faced with the choice of the Muslim and Christian youths joining an extremist organization or volunteering for the IDF, it is preferable that they come to us."

The officer added that in recruiting Arab volunteers, the army would have to watch out for "criminal elements" trying to infiltrate its ranks.

"The idea of conscription could appeal to Arab criminals as an easy way to lay their hands on weapons. We will have to prevent the conscription of anyone who might harm us," the officer said.

In the last two years, there has been a steady rise in the number of Arab youths enlisting, and currently several dozen Christians and Muslims volunteer each year. Several Muslim officers, and even one female Christian officer, are now serving in Israel's army.

At the initiative of former defence minister Moshe Arens, the army last month approved a plan to double the number of Bedouins volunteering for military service within three years. This year, some 350 Bedouins are expected to enlist.

Arens spoke out several times in favor of drafting Israel's Arab citizens, arguing that that was the only way they could achieve full equality. His statements drew criticism from Israeli Arab leaders.

British minister wrote anti-Israel articles

By DOUGLAS DAVIS
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

LONDON — Britain's new foreign minister with special responsibility for the Middle East, who once called for Israel to be dismantled, is now trying to woo the Jewish community.

Peter Hain, a leading British anti-racist campaigner who was appointed July 29, said his own history of outspoken support for the creation of a Palestinian state at the expense of Israel's existence had been modified by the change in relationship between Israel and the Palestinians.

"People must not be imprisoned by the past," he said. "If they were, nothing would ever move forward."

Hain, who arrived in Britain at the age of 16, when his anti-apartheid parents were forced to leave South Africa, said many of his parent's closest friends in their anti-apartheid struggle had been Jewish.

"As a result," he told the London Jewish Chronicle, "I come into this job as a friend of the Jewish community and I hope that is how the community will see me."

One of Hain's first acts after his appointment was to invite Dror Zeigerman, the Israeli ambassador to London, for a meeting in his office, an encounter described as cordial and fence mending.

Hain's attitude toward Israel was far less cordial in 1976, when he wrote in the London Guardian: "The present Zionist state is, by definition racist, and will have to be dismantled," he wrote.

"Territorially, the new Palestine will be equivalent to the pre-1948 Palestine defined during the British Mandate. It will not be shunted off into the occupied West Bank or the Gaza Strip."

The question for Hain was not whether, but how, the Jewish state would be "dismantled" and a secular, democratic Palestinian entity emerge.

"It can be brought about in an orderly way through negotiation as the PLO would prefer," he wrote. "Or it will be brought about by force.

"The choice lies with the Israelis. They can recognize now that the tide of history is against their brand of greedy oppression, or they can dig in and invite a bloodbath."

Earlier, in October 1973 – when the Jewish state was facing the Yom Kippur War – Hain wrote that "the world cannot allow its shame over the historic persecution of Jews to rationalize the present persecution of the Palestinians.

"Our quarrel is with the whole doctrine of Zionism and the arrogance with which its supporters dismiss the Palestinians and condemn them to a life of desperate misery," he wrote.

Hain, 49, is regarded as a politician with conviction in the ideology-free environment of Prime Minister Tony Blair's government.

He has not made any significant pronouncements on Israeli-Arab affairs in the past decade, and he is said to understand the political realities of the moment, which includes positive sentiments toward Israel in the prime minister's circles.

While he is unlikely to question Israel's right to exist – or seriously deviate from established government policy – he is expected to side with Israel's fiercest critics in international forums and to place emphasis on issues such as nuclear proliferation when dealing with Israel and Arab states that he regards as reactionary.

An Israeli diplomatic source said he hoped Hain would be a "balanced and engaged minister," adding that Israeli officials "look forward to co-operating with him."

Fund for French Jews launched

By DOUGLAS DAVIS
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

LONDON — One of Britain's largest financial institutions, Barclays Bank, is establishing a $3.6-million (US) fund to compensate the heirs of its Jewish customers in France whose accounts were seized during World War II.

In making the offer, the bank has broken with eight French financial institutions that were also named in a class action suit in New York.

Barclays says it had some 230 Jewish customers in France when the bank was taken over by the German occupying authorities, but more may come forward when advertisements appear inviting potential claimants to contact the fund.

Any money left in the fund after claims are settled will be donated to Jewish charities that are involved in Holocaust education.

Chris Duncan, director of international and private banking at Barclays, said the bank believes that customers and their heirs obtained their accounts at the end of the war.

"But given the length of time, we have not got files that demonstrate that every last claim was paid out," he said. "That is why we have reached this agreement."

The settlement, which is based on the bank's one-percent share of the French market in the war, is dwarfed by the $1.25-billion fund agreed to by Swiss banks last August in response to a similar class action suit.

The French banks have indicated they will continue to fight in the U.S. courts because they are participating in a settlement process overseen by the French government.

"We are a bit different from the Swiss and French banks," Duncan said. "We have sought not to have a drawn out legal battle."

The French branch of Barclays was the subject of a scandal in March, when it was revealed that its then-manager not only acted as the Nazis' banker during World War II, but also volunteered to hand over Jewish employees.

The revelations came from material found in the U.S. National Archives by researchers working on a BBC television documentary, Banking with Hitler, which examined the role of European central banks during the war.

According to the material, senior officials at the bank's Paris branch "volunteered" information about its Jewish employees to the Nazis and helped to arrange financing for projects that aided the Nazi war effort.

The records also show the bank received a substantial cash deposit from the Drancy transit camp in a Paris suburb, money that had been plundered from Jewish prisoners who were bound for Auschwitz.

According to information found in the archives, U.S. Treasury officials who conducted an investigation in France immediately after the war discovered an intimate collaboration between the British bank's French officials and the Nazis.

The officials also found that French banks themselves seized a total of 3.5 billion old francs – about $750 million in current values – from Jews on behalf of the Nazis.

Perhaps most surprising is not the denial by Barclays that it had any knowledge of the activities of its Paris branch during World War II, but that it continued to employ Cheradame as its Paris manager until he retired in the 1960s.

Levy slams Arafat

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Foreign Minister David Levy, Sunday, interrupted a weekly presentation to the cabinet by Shin Bet head Ami Ayalon, to launch a stinging attack at Yasser Arafat's comments made last week when Arafat stated Palestinians should "continue the struggle and the Jihad until our young children wave the flag above Jerusalem."

Levy said Arafat's comments bordered on incitement and Ayalon concurred, adding: "His comments are serious, but they see it differently."

Ayalon explained that Arafat was under pressure due to the opening of the Syrian peace track, and that he was personally hurt by the offensive remarks of Syrian Defence Minister Mustafa Tlas.

At the meeting, Prime Minister Ehud Barak explained that galvanizing the peace process was a "complex problem," and that "the public should know that there are no magical or instant solutions", he said.

David Levy

He said the implementation of the Wye agreement would start in September 1999, and the second date should be October 1, 1999, when a further five percent of land within Area C would be transferred to Area B. The third date, which Barak is considering postponing until mid-February 2000, may be November 15, 1999, when Israel would transfer three to five percent of the territory to the Palestinians.

C&C provides a memorable event

The consultants at C&C Group have expanded the idea of decor to include everything you see and hear at a special event, from props to live acts to floral arrangements to place cards. Here, that much-used word "total" is right on.

C&C can create any virtual environment you want. Is it Paris' Moulin Rouge in the 1890s? Dracula's crypt? A tropical rain forest? C&C makes it authentic, down to the finest detail.

At the same time, as clients grow more sophisticated and design-conscious, C&C's Artistic Director Richard Cadoret has noticed a trend to more subtle decor. For an undersea ambience, instead of obvious props like netting on the walls, a client may prefer an artful blend of diffuse music, rippling light and delicate tints of aquamarine.

Many people want to make their event memorable with a unique, magical setting, not portraying a stock theme duplicated elsewhere. This also holds for family events. And in planning family celebrations, the sophistication encouraged by the entertainment industry has made kids' tastes a factor to reckon with.

Cadoret welcomes the challenges these trends pose. And, having earned plenty of corporate repeat and referral business, C&C is offering its artistry to family events. With the right blend of decor and audiovisual effects, the stars are the limit on what they — and you — can do.

C&C consults with you on an ongoing basis, always keeping in mind the occasion for the event, and the aesthetic impression you want to create.

Everything from chair covers to centrepieces is submitted for your approval.

Cadoret pays close attention to matching decor and setting. A Roaring 'Twenties concept, for example, often won't match the severe elegance of a classical ballroom. While you can work with some halls almost as you find them, more decor and props are needed in others.

C&C takes great care with materials. Everything looks fresh and flawless. Each prop is wrapped in its own casing; wear and tear is minimized, and repaired at once. With such treatment, Cadoret says, all of his props including some faithful standbys look brand-new.

C&C works with a wide range of budgets. Book six months to a year ahead, Cadoret advises, to make it easier for C&C to give you their best. Call Richard Cadoret now at 416-421-8042.

Musician goes in Search of Broadway

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — If composer Harry Lewis was 49 in '49 instead of '99, he might have found himself in the company of Broadway's masters of the musical — Gershwin, Hart or Hammerstein!

What Lewis does have in common with these musical greats is that he, too, sold out on The Great White Way (Broadway).

His original compositions, compiled on a self-financed CD called 15 Songs In Search Of Broadway, was available in New York record stores until all copies were scooped up by fans in search of the next Sondheim.

Born in New Jersey, the oldest of three children, Lewis credits his father, Stanley for instilling in him a love of this American art form.

"Broadway is what I write naturally. I was exposed to the songs of musical theatre at a very young age by my father, who has excellent taste for a good lyric," Lewis said.

As a child, Lewis became so addicted to his piano that while other neighborhood moms were insisting their children should practise, Thyra Lewis was admonishing her child prodigy to take a break and go out and play.

His first performance in front of an audience was a surprise, even to him.

"While attending Syracuse University in 1970, I decided to check out a free movie, but the movie didn't arrive. Somebody asked if anyone wanted to perform to make the wait more enjoyable. After quite a bit of pleading and nudging from my friends, I ambled on stage and played a Mozart Sonata.

"I received an enthusiastic ovation, but on account of stage fright, that was the last time I played for an audience until recent performances at Toronto nightclubs."

After graduating, Lewis moved to Toronto to get married. He made his living writing advertising campaigns and the occasional jingle for such clients as Kraft/General Foods, Crossley-Karastan Carpets and the Canadian Broadcasting Company.

In 1978 while working on a jingle, Lewis met Pierre Nolès at a Montreal recording session. Soon the two partnered the production of almost two dozen songs in 2½ years.

By 1982 Lewis and his wife had separated, and he was left with custody of the piano. To console himself Lewis, by then a dual citizen, stayed in Toronto and began composing on his own.

"I love Canada. It is the greatest country. As much as I love New York – Toronto is a wonderful town, so cosmopolitan, with an excellent artistic cultural community," he said.

Lewis first had his music heard outside the jingle world in 1990, when he was called upon to co-write lyrics and music for the inaugural season of TV Ontario's Bookmice.

A few years ago, the seeds for 15 Songs In Search Of Broadway were planted when he wrote a number of the songs for a one-woman musical called Ragtime Rosie starring Mary McCandless, known from Ragtime.

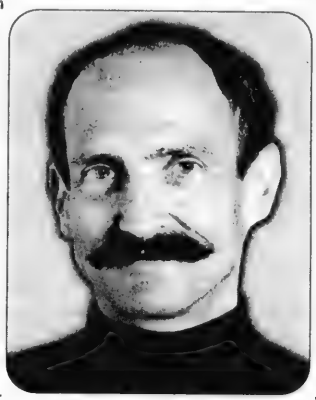
Lewis wrote the lyrics and the musical skeleton, which was then passed on to orchestrator, Mark Rutherford.



Harry Lewis

"Afterwards, encouraged by the response of the people who saw the show, I approached Mark and Mary and asked if we could do a CD. They believed in the songs so much that they both donated their time and talent," Lewis said.

The CD includes the toe-tapping ditty It's Never Too Late, and Sophie Tucker (The Red Hot Mama Rag), as well as the humorous No One But Me. Songs like Almost, What Did I Know? and A Place Where I Belong will tear at the heartstrings of any theatrical audience.

Lewis said, "I'm very lucky to be able to indulge in my deep and truest desire, my love of music, and attempt with integrity to get into an exciting business. I am very fortunate that I can find the time to focus my energies into writing this stuff, because it ain't easy!"

The CD is available at Song & Script, Theatrebooks, and Chapters on Bloor Street West or http://webhome.idirect.com/~lewisong.

BOOK EXPLORES CARLEBACH LEGEND

Five years after the death of the singer-holy man Rabbi Shlomo Carlebach, his reputation for holiness continues to grow. A recent publication of the publishing house, Jason Aronson, adds considerably to the legend of the man whom many have pinpointed as the source of the modern Jewish outreach movement.

Holy Brother: Inspiring Stories and Enchanted Tales about Rabbi Shlomo Carlebach, compiled by Yitta Halberstam Mandelbaum, and with a foreward by Elie Wiesel, is a moving collection of first-person accounts of Carlebach's unfailing generosity and good deeds.

Tireless in his pursuit of wayward Jews who could be persuaded back to the fold, Carlebach had a seemingly endless capacity for charity and love and fulfilling his mission of "bringing light to all the dark places in the world."

Anyone who has read the collections of stories about the Baal Shem Tov, and other revered chassidic masters, will easily recognize the genre. Anyone who has ever encountered Carlebach in concert will know of his intense charisma and understand how he could have inspired such moving tributes.

Holy Brother is one of three books that Jason Aronson has published recently on Carlebach. Shlomo's Stories: Selected Tales presents a collection of Carlebach's favorite chassidic tales.

The Holy Beggars' Banquet: Traditional Jewish Tales and Teachings of the Late, Great Reb Shlomo Carlebach and Others in the Spirit of the 1960s presents a variety of items published in the newsletter that Carlebach published at his famous House of Love and Prayer in San Francisco in the 1970s.

Participants also wanted for classes in Jewish spiritual meditation. 992-1245.

Preview of a Preview: As reported earlier in this column, Jackie Mason, the brilliant, crazed Jewish comic whose career has taken him from the Borscht belt to Broadway, is scheduled to perform at the north Toronto comedy club Comedywood from Oct. 16 to 30. Mason is giving audiences here a preview of a new show that he intends to open soon afterwards on Broadway.

Mason recently performed the new material in London, England, where a reviewer from the Jewish Chronicle greeted his act with enthusiasm and some caution. Jackie Mason, the Chronicle noted, is an equal-opportunity offender, casting insults to everyone with equanimity, regardless of race, religion, age, sex or body size.

According to the Chronicle, there are only two possible reactions to Mason's show. The first is to laugh uproariously at Mason's comic shtick and find his politically incorrect barbs to be essentially harmless and all in good fun. The second is to laugh uproariously at Mason's comic shtick but also to be somewhat offended. The London critic admitted he was leaning towards the second category.

Judge for yourself. Call 905-761-0543 or 870-8000 for tickets.

Native Art: The First Nations community of Canada can boast a glossy new magazine covering the native arts scene. The premiere issue of Genous is an impressive full-color production of 64 pages, with features on acclaimed native artist Bill Reid and other subjects. The quarterly costs $7.50 per issue.

Fred Hershicovitch (top) and Phil Herman (bottom) are among the many artists exhibiting at Dialogue.

Book offers pioneering look into ghetto writings

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

An intriguing collection of essays throws a new light into the dark world of the Jewish ghettos of Eastern Europe as seen by a cavalcade of Jewish writers, including Heinrich Heine, Joseph Roth, and numerous others who have been all but forgotten.

Published by Camden House, Ghetto Writing: Traditional and Eastern Jewry in German-Jewish Literature from Heine to Hilsenrath offers a pioneering look into this rich subcategory of literature, which for the most part remains untranslated into English.

Remarkably, the book was prepared entirely outside of Germany by two scholars, Anne Fuchs and Florian Krobb, attached to universities in Dublin, Ireland. Its 14 essays were contributed by critics in Scandinavia, Germany, Great Britain and Ireland.

Commendably, Fuchs and Krobb rendered all cited literary quotations into English, thus providing English-speaking readers with an insightful glimpse into this important but obscure body of work.

In an introduction, Fuchs and Krobb identify and fix the date of the first true piece of ghetto writing. It is Aus dem Ghetto (From the Ghetto), Leopold Kompert's collection of stories about life behind ghetto walls, which appeared in 1848.

Publishing their anthology on the occasion of the 150th anniversary of Kompert's collection, the editors acknowledge many instances of "ghetto writing" occurring decades before Kompert, but assert that he was the first to put the ghetto setting into a universal literary context and use it as a metaphorical model to treat issues related to Jewish identity and emancipation.

In one Kompert story, Outside the Ghetto, he describes the exhilarating feeling of escaping, albeit momentarily, from the confined space into which all of Jewish society had been crammed.

It is a first-person reminiscence of how the narrator, as a boy, ran up the hill above the Judengasse, against the advice of family members, and experienced a dizzying sense of freedom:

"They had warned me, they had urged me not to go, not to take this dangerous path up the mountain; but I had laughed at them and said: Let me go! and now I stood up there. My grandmother is wringing her hands in anguish towards me, I can hear a cry depart from her lips, and my grandfather is wagging his finger and shaking his head thoughtfully."

Repeatedly, Kompert seems to be looking back on the ghetto from a sentimental position of exteriority. This nostalgic, romanticized stance is one of two main polarized views that contemporaneous writers had of the ghetto. The other view, steeped in modern realism, highlights the crowding, stench, dirt, lack of sunlight and other squalid conditions.

In his essay, The Frankfurt Judengasse in Eyewitness Accounts from the Seventeenth to the Nineteenth Century, Eoin Bourke offers an extraordinary set of views of the infamous Frankfurt ghetto, formerly one of Europe's most vertical and densely crowded pieces of real estate. According to some (non-Jewish) observers, the Jews deserved no better than the inhumane conditions under which they were forced to live.

"The more they feel locked in and sit on top of each other, the better they propagate: the place is creeping and crawling with Hebrew figures," writes one hostile observer. "To the question of how this ancient remainder of the twelve Israelite tribes nourishes itself, the answer is by fraud."

Other observers are more sympathetic, seeing the dejected condition of the ghetto Jews as an indictment of the anti-Semitic attitudes of the majority.

"That," notes one writer, "is our Christian way of treating a people who have the same human right to freedom as we have, from whom we are descended, so to speak, who have preserved more originality, uniqueness and purity of morals than we, and whom we now force to live from usury by thwarting every possibility of an alternative means of living in the most dishonorable way."

It is precisely this attitude that formed the earliest pro-emancipation writings of Dohm and other civil libertarians, who campaigned for full civil rights for the Jews.

Ghetto Writing offers a scintillating glimpse of a literary treasure trove. Works examined include Wilhelm Jensen's 1869 novel The Jews of Cologne, Joseph Roth's 1927 novel Jews On Their Wanderings, Herz Wolf Katz's 1937 novel The Fishmanns, Alexander Granach's 1945 autobiographical novel There Goes An Actor, and works by Hugo von Hofmannsthal and Edgar Hilsenrath. There is even a study of Zionist images from the journal Die Welt, which Theodor Herzl edited.

The final essay, which focuses on ghetto imagery in modern punk and rap culture, brings the collection right up into the 1990s. The ghettos and shtetls of yesterday are no more, but their memory and meaning evidently live on, transformed and renewed by Western pop culture.

An Israeli kosher restaurant chain to savor

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TEL AVIV — One good reason among many for visiting Tel Aviv – which marks its 90th anniversary this year – is Shipudy Hatikva.

Local gourmets and gourmands alike are already well-acquainted with this kosher Israeli restaurant chain, but most foreign tourists have never heard of it.

Shipudy Hatikva, under the supervision of the Tel Aviv-Jaffa rabbinate, specializes in lively Middle Eastern food: zingy salads, heart-warming soups, aromatic grilled meats and fragrant desserts.

Originally, there was only one Shipudy Hatikva, in Tel Aviv's downtrodden Hatikva neighborhood. But demand for its food was such that the Aslan family, the proprietors of the restaurant, had no alternative but to open another branch.

Since then, Shipudy Hatikva has expanded to Holon, Ramat Gan and Herzliya Pituach, all within easy driving distance of Tel Aviv.

My introduction to this excellent restaurant was through Israeli friends, Aryeh and Ida Heilweil. They live in central Tel Aviv, practically across the street from one of its branches on Ibn Gvirol.

One balmy evening, when Ida was in no mood to prepare a meal, which happens quite often, Aryeh suggested Shipudy Hatikva. Being open to new culinary experiences, I welcomed the opportunity.

The restaurant, about a block away from the Habimah cultural centre and just steps from the Beit Sokolov press building, is simple, unadorned and immaculately clean.

And, I might add, the waiters neither put on airs nor cloyingly identify themselves by name. In addition, the service is friendly and efficient.

No sooner had we sat down than a dozen small appetizers, ranging from hummus and tehina to eggplant and cabbage salads, were placed on the table for us to sample.

In Israeli fashion, we scooped up the tangy morsels with torn bits of warm Iraqi pita from a taboon oven.

Within minutes, the main courses arrived. We feasted on skewered chicken taken from the soft and juicy thigh and on kebabs made of ground beef and lamb, garnished with garlic and herbs.

Washed down by soft drinks and Goldstar black malt beer, it was a delicious and succulent repast.

True to the owners' Iraqi origin, the fare at Shipudy Hatikva is Middle Eastern to the core, with delicate Balkan influences.

The varied eggplant salads are particularly tasty, running the gamut from eggplant in tehina to eggplant in vinegar.

Barbecues are probably Shipudy Hatikva's greatest strength. From skewered chicken livers to barbecued lamb shishlik, this is food that schmecks.

Fish is also on the menu – typical Israeli varieties like Bouri, Mousht and Dennis.

Desserts are multi-national: German-influenced creme Bavaria to Turkish malabiah.

No matter what you order at the moderately-priced Shipudy Hatikva, you are bound to be pleased with the quality and the quantities.

This, truly, is inspirational food.

Jewish travel guides

Oscar Israelowitz is an architectural consultant, professional photographer, publisher, author and a conductor.

In recent years, however, the Belgian-born Brooklyn resident has perhaps become best known for his specialty of producing Jewish travel guides on a variety of destinations. He writes, publishes and distributes most of them himself through his company Israelowitz Publishing, based in Brooklyn, N.Y.

Brooklyn is the focus of at least seven of the several dozen books that the company has produced so far. New York City guidebooks of various sorts account for five more titles, including the newly released Jewish Heritage Trail of New York, by Oscar Israelowitz.

Published in soft cover at 180 pages, The Jewish Heritage Trail of New York is a thorough compilation of Jewish sites in New York City, the locus of the second largest Jewish population in the world.

Israelowitz starts at the foot of Manhattan in the financial district, and works his way northward through Chinatown, the lower East Side, Greenwich Village, midtown Manhattan east and west, and the Upper West Side. The sites are presented chronologically and organized as stops in various walking tours.

The Jews played a role in the earliest history of Manhattan. Israelowitz describes a site called the Jewish Plymouth Rock, located in the financial district, marked by a copper marker erected "to honor the memory of the 23 men, women and children who landed in September 1654, and founded the first Jewish community in North America."

Even the historic Fraunces Tavern, where George Washington bid farewell to his officers in 1783, has a Jewish connection. It was built as a residence in 1719 by Stephan de Lancey, whose wife, Phila Franks, was a child of the first Jewish settlers.

EISENSTADT MUSEUM HIGHLIGHTS PAST

Less than one hour by car eastward from Vienna are a series of towns of special interest to Jewish travellers.

These are the once-famous Siebengemeinden – the seven noteworthy Jewish communities of Eisenstadt, Mattersdorf, Deutschkreutz, Lackenbach, Kobersdorf, Frauenkirchen and Kittsee.

The largest and most significant of these towns is Eisenstadt, capital of the Austrian province of Burgenland, in which a Jewish museum has been established in a house in the former ghetto.

The Austrian Jewish Museum in Eisenstadt is larger and more impressive than its counterpart in Vienna. Of national scope, it attempts to convey the history of Jewish life across all of Austria from the Dark Ages to the present, paying full attention to the darkest age of all, the Nazi era.

A series of adjoining rooms contain an impressive array of artifacts that include illuminated Jewish manuscripts, Chanukah lamps and wooden synagogue models. These items convey the richness of the former Jewish community, which had a population of only about 900 at its height.

An actual synagogue on the first floor contains many genuine antique artifacts and is dedicated to the memory of Rabbi Samson Wertheimer (1658-1724), the illustrious sage who headed the local rabbinical court.

Wertheimer, the original owner of the house in which the museum is situated, was regarded as a gaon or eminent scholar. Living in a province that was then under Esterhazy protection and officially part of Hungary, he was the Chief Rabbi of Hungary.

As such, he was one of numerous celebrated luminaries who made the town famous as a centre of Torah learning and helped inspire its nickname of Little Jerusalem. Others include Meir Eisenstadt (otherwise known as the Maharam Ash), and the German-born Rabbi Dr. Israel Hildesheimer.

Like the synagogue, which was damaged but not destroyed during Kristallnacht, the town's Jewish cemetery somehow survived the Nazi period, although it was damaged by vandals several years ago.

Rabbi Samson Wertheimer

A key to the fence is available in the adjacent hospital. Considering they may be three centuries old, many of the Hebrew tombstones are remarkably legible. An eerie calm pervades the fenced-in enclosure where the stones lean this way and that amidst the tall grass.

Besides its rich Jewish history, Eisenstadt has a strong musical association. The composer Joseph Haydn (1732-1809) lived here for 30 years as the official composer of the Esterhazy court.

Haydn's works are still regularly performed in Schloss Esterhazy, the palace that dominates the town. As castles go, however, the Burg Forchtenstein, situated on a dramatic hilltop a few kilometres away, is far more impressive; it is filled with tents, scabbards, armor and many other relics of the historic wars with the Turks in the 16th and 17th centuries.

A drive to Eisenstadt makes a worthwhile and picturesque day-trip from Vienna.

The Promise of Peace: Last month US President Bill Clinton and Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Barak released a joint statement that is expected to give a tangible boost to tourism in Israel in the coming year.

Clinton and Barak stated "that promoting tourism to Israel and the entire region presents a unique opportunity to promote co-operation and spread economic benefits to the peoples of the Middle East.

"Both sides agree to explore specific steps to develop this unique potential together, and with other interested regional partners and their private sectors, beginning the fall of 1999."

Anecdotes Sought: Helen Kariv, an Israeli writer, is interested in hearing unusual and interesting stories about travel in Israel. Canadians to Israel: Arie Shevy-Shibi, director of the Israel Government Tourist Office in Toronto, recently told a press gathering that he expects the number of Canadians visiting Israel in 1999 to be 20 percent more than in 1998, and 30 percent more in 2000 than in 1999. Specifically, he estimates that 65,000 Canadians will set foot in Israel during the millennium year, as compared to 40,000 in 1998.

The book points out the sites of many historic shuls and shtiebls, including North America's first synagogue, the innovatively shaped Floating Synagogue in Tribeca, and the Eldridge Street Synagogue in the Lower East Side.

It also describes the oldest Jewish cemetery, the headquarters of the first Jewish Forward, the homes of Eddie Cantor and Ira Gershwin, the birthplace of B'nai Brith in 1843, the Streit's matzah factory, several Yiddish theatres and even a Yiddish Theatre Star Walk to rival the star-studded sidewalks of Hollywood.

Additionally, the book offers lists (not comprehensive) of kosher restaurants, places to pray, and other city attractions.

Israelowitz Publishing has also produced Jewish travel guides to Europe, Italy, Israel, and Canada, most written by Oscar Israelowitz himself. Recently published, the fifth edition of The United State's Jewish Travel Guide is a 668-page state-by-state compilation of Jewish sites, with a capsule history of Jewish settlement in each area.

The book offers listings of synagogues, singles organizations, kosher establishments and mikvahs.

Also recently updated is the fifth edition of Israelowitz's Eat Your Way Through America: A Kosher Dining Guide that lists more than 1,000 eateries, as well as Chabad and Hillel houses.

As an architect, Israelowitz has worked on the Synagogue and Holocaust Center of the Bobover chassidim in Brooklyn and other buildings. As a photographer, his works have been on exhibit at the Whitney Museum.

As noted, he's also a conductor, but not the musical kind. He conducts group tours of the Lower East Side, Ellis Island, chassidic Brooklyn, Jewish Newark, and the Jewish Catskills.

Israelowitz's books can be found in most Jewish bookstores.

Canada finishes 7th in Pan Am Maccabi Games

By PAUL LUNGEN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Canadian athletes suffered a "black Monday" on the sporting fields of Mexico City en route to a disappointing seventh place finish overall at the recently concluded 9th Pan American Maccabi Games.

Three Canadian teams – in junior baseball, softball and master's basketball – started the day with chances of gold medals, while a fourth team, the indoor soccer squad, played for bronze.

Unfortunately, none of the teams won their big games and Canada had to settle for three silvers and a fourth place finish in indoor soccer.

Overall, Canada was led by swimmer Sharon Werner of Toronto, who won four of Canada's 13 medals. Werner's two gold medals came in the 50-metre freestyle and 100-metre breaststroke. She rounded out her team-leading performance with silver in the 100-metre freestyle and bronze in the 200-metre freestyle.

The female bowling team was Canada's most productive, winning two silver medals and three bronzes.

The team's medal breakdown was two bronze: Penny Lyons; bronze: Lyons and Lisa Abush; silver: Abush, Francine Pomerantz and Lyons; silver: Abush, Francine Pomerantz, Lyons, Joy Gray and Marilyn Noss.

For the umpteenth time in Maccabi softball, Canada lined up against its arch nemesis, the United States, in the championship game. Incredibly, the Americans were still led by ace pitcher David Blackburn, who has been throwing for the U.S.A. since the 1985 Maccabiah Games in Israel.

Mark Bendahan, who coached the junior baseball team, was also a participant in the '85 games and he pitched again in Mexico City when his junior baseball coaching duties allowed. He led the Canadians in the semi-final versus Mexico, winning 6-5 in extra innings. Bendahan's coaching duties made him unavailable for the gold medal game, won by the United States, 9-0.

In master's basketball, Canada went through the five-game preliminary round undefeated but lost in the championship game to a younger Venezuelan team, 57-52.

"It was tight right up to the end," said Allen Gerskup, chair of Maccabi Canada's national athletic committee. "It was a great game."

Canada's indoor soccer team won two of its preliminary games easily, defeating Panama 13-4 and Guatemala, 20-0, but then ran up against the Latin American soccer powerhouses.

Mexico beat them 5-0 while Argentina tamed them11-2. Brazil handed them their last loss, 6-0, leaving them in fourth place. Eliazer Amir won the "Golden Toe Award" for most goals (14) scored in the tournament.

In master's golf, Philip Levy earned a bronze medal while Gabriel Davis won silver in tennis.

Altogether, 1,600 athletes from 14 countries, including Israel and Australia, participated in the games. Canada was represented by a 90-strong contingent, 69 of them athletes.

Mexico, with 400 members, had the largest team followed by the United States with 200.

The colorful opening ceremonies were a highlight of the games, with 20,000 spectators crowding into the Palacio de los Deportes to hear the president of Mexico, Ernesto Zedillo Ponce de Leon, open the games.

Cabinet expansion significant move

As I wrote in this space last month, the issue of constitutional rights is likely to be a cause of dissent among the coalition partners of newly elected Prime Minister Ehud Barak.

Having run on a platform of respect for the rule of law, Barak could have been expected to pursue the legislation of laws protecting civil rights or limiting the ability of the government and the Knesset to ride roughshod over the country's evolving constitution.

It was therefore surprising to some that one of the Barak government's first acts was to amend the Basic Law of the Government — not to limit the power of the government or to protect the rights of the citizens, but to enable the prime minister to enlarge the cabinet and thereby make more political appointments.

In order to understand the significance of this move, it is important to remember that Israel does not have a written constitution, but that civil rights in this country grew out of decisions handed down by the Supreme Court over the decades.

In the past few years, the Knesset has expanded the number of Basic Laws which are meant, in the future, to comprise a constitution. In the meantime, some judges have shown more readiness to anchor rights in the Basic Laws by seeing them as above regular Knesset legislation, and some of the laws can only be amended by a special majority of the Knesset.

As in most countries, Israel's constitution deals not only with civil rights, but also with the powers and authority of the branches of government.

The Basic Law of the Government governs the executive branch. Section 33 of the Basic Law of the Government states that the maximum number of ministers, including the prime minister, will not exceed 18. Faced with demands from his coalition partners, Barak agreed to amend this section, increasing the maximum number of ministers to 24.

At first glance, this does not seem to be a terribly radical or disturbing move, After all, I do not know of a single constitutional scholar who believes there is something sacred about having 18 cabinet ministers, and aside from the increased cost to the treasury and the decreased efficiency of cabinet meetings, one may ask whether any damage has been done by the amendment.

I would argue, however, that the amendment is damaging and while not disastrous, should not have been enacted. This is because of the educational nature of a constitution, particularly but not only, in a troubled and evolving democracy.

Israel is a fractious society, made up largely of immigrants from countries with no democratic heritage. Whether one thinks of the eastern European socialists who created the political culture, the immigrants from Arab and North-African countries who arrived in the '50s, or the many new olim from the former Soviet Union, it seems miraculous that Israel is as respectful of western notions of civil rights as it is. When one adds in the security situation, it becomes even more apparent how fragile this state of affairs may be.

Therefore, regardless of one's opinion of the content of the evolving constitution, one fact is clear: a constitution which may be changed at will for political purposes will not function as a real constitution.

While the increase in the number of ministers is certainly not the same as restrictions on freedom of speech or assembly, the argument can be made that the more amendments are made for non-constitutional purposes, the less respect citizens will have for the Basic Laws and the easier it will be to change them frequently.

Constitutions should be written and changed hesitantly, after giving careful thought to the effects such amendments will have on the rights of the citizens and the stability of the regime. It is a bad precedent to change a constitution for purposes of patronage or other political gain.

It is important not to exaggerate. The latest amendment to the Basic Law of Government is not a catastrophe, and does not, in and of itself, cause direct damage to the rule of law. It is simply unfortunate that the new government has commenced on its legislative path with a step that sends a negative message in an area to which it claimed to attach great importance.

About Life

Dear Ella,

Why is it so hard for some people to apologize when clearly an apology is in order?

I have been seeing Steven for the last six months. For the most part we get along beautifully, but like any couple, we argue from time to time.

When I am in the wrong, I say I'm sorry with no hesitation and with complete sincerity. When Steven is at fault, I get the royal treatment. He brings me flowers, he becomes sweet as pie and he tends to my every need. This usually lasts for about 24 hours. Have I ever heard an apology from him? Never! When I confront him about this, it just creates another argument.

What is the big deal? Why can't he admit he's sorry when it's appropriate for him to do so?

Absent Apologies

Dear Absent Apologies

Have you ever heard of the saying, "Actions speak louder than words"? It seems to me that this is one of those times.

Sometimes people don't like to admit they are sorry. I assume it's because they regard it as a humbling experience and feel somewhat vulnerable saying the actual words. Many people are not comfortable with those emotions and therefore work their way around them.

The reasons may be deep-rooted or they may simply come from pride. In any case, there are obviously more ways to admit you are wrong than just saying the words, "I'm sorry," and Steven has found one of those ways.

If you care about this man, don't make a big deal about the absent apologies. You know by his actions that he is genuinely sorry and trying to make amends. That is his way of making things right.

If you feel you must hear the words, then discuss it at a time when you're not in the middle of an argument. It will be easier to talk about when you are both on an equal footing and in a non-confrontational situation.

His actions are still coming from the heart. Don't minimize them; they are very real.

Communities boost security

In wake of L.A. JCC shootings

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Security was front and centre for Jewish communal agencies, synagogues and other facilities across the country last week, with at least one Canadian Jewish leader warning that the Aug. 10 shootings at the Los Angeles Jewish community centre could happen here.

"We in Canada would be shocked if events like that took place here," said Sol Littman, director of the Canadian branch of the Simon Wiesenthal Centre. "But the likelihood is that U.S. patterns will cross the border. It's less likely in Canada, but far from impossible.

"Our community should be prepared for this. The question is, what do you about it?"

In Montreal, at least, police acted quickly last Wednesday night when two youths, reportedly skinheads, were apprehended in front of the Solomon Schechter Academy, a Jewish elementary school.

The youths had tipped over a water fountain, but there were no signs that they planned to enter the building. They may be charged with public mischief.

Montreal Jewish officials applauded the quick action by police, saying it was reassuring in light of the L.A. attack.

B'nai Brith Quebec region director Robert Libman said there was no evidence linking the youths to any extremist group.

And officials in Winnipeg say last week's desecration of a Jewish cemetery there was unrelated to the Los Angeles incident (see story below).

Police in Montreal, as well as in Toronto and likely in other Canadian cities, issued internal

Winnipeg cemetery desecrated

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The Jewish community is in a state of shock following the worst desecration of a Jewish cemetery in memory.

In the early morning hours of Aug. 10, someone entered the 90-year-old Hebrew Sick Benefit Association Cemetery in north Winnipeg and knocked over or uprooted 219 headstones.

The damage is estimated to be over $100,000. While it is estimated that 75 percent of the downed headstones just need to be remounted, the remaining 25 percent were damaged and need to be repaired or replaced.

The Winnipeg police Hate Crimes Unit is investigating the incident.

According to police, the lack of a calling card in the form of graffiti or slogans, would seem to indicate that the perpetrators were most likely not motivated by anti-Semitism.

The executive and board of directors of the Beth Israel Synagogue, which operates the cemetery, has issued a press release notifying the public that round-the-clock security has been put in place at the cemetery.

The cemetery committee and synagogue will pay for the repair of the damaged stones if there are no surviving relatives.

"A wanton attack against one cemetery is, symbolically, an attack ... against decent people of all races..." says Beth Israel's Rabbi Alan Green.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Montrealers Compete

MONTREAL — Three students from Montreal are in Israel competing in this year's Olympiyeda, the country's highly popular international science contest for teens. A total of 25 teens from several nations were chosen for the all-expense paid trip, from among 400 applicants. Dubbed "the Olympics of the mind," Olympiyeda is designed to foster interest in science and technology. The three Canadian students are from Montreal, and all are in Grade 10. They are Jonathan Assouline, 16, and Jason Hadid, also 16, both from Herzliah High School, and Mathew Suss, 16, from Bialik High School. Participants are given a multiple-choice general science exam. The top scorers qualify for a second exam on a specific topic. This year's subject is space science.

ISRAEL

Burger King Spat

JERUSALEM — The Arab League is threatening to boycott the Burger King restaurant chain for opening a restaurant in the Jewish settlement of Ma'aleh Adumim several weeks ago. The league said it is awaiting the outcome of negotiations between Burger King and a U.S. Muslim group, which last week called for the boycott. Benny Kashriel, the mayor of Ma'aleh Adumim, warned that the boycott is a "big mistake," adding it would harm Israeli-Palestinian peace negotiations.

Eichmann Papers

JERUSALEM — Israel's Justice Ministry said it would release the memoirs Adolf Eichmann wrote in 1962 while awaiting execution in Israel. A ministry official said the 1,300 pages of handwritten notes would be released at the "earliest opportunity," and would include background and commentary. Critics of the move have maintained that the memoirs would be misused by Holocaust deniers.

Rape Suspect At Large

JERUSALEM — One individual is suspected of raping and sexually assaulting more than 20 women in the Tel Aviv area during the past three years, Israeli police say. Stumped in their efforts to find the suspect, the police lifted a ban on publishing details of their investigation in the hope of enlisting the public's help.

Arab Named Levy Deputy

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Ehud Barak has appointed an Israeli Arab legislator as deputy foreign minister. Foreign Minister David Levy said the appointment of Nawaf Masalha reflects Barak's desire to have appointees who are representative of all segments of the Israeli population.

WORLD

Bronfman Honored

WASHINGTON — President Bill Clinton last week awarded Edgar Bronfman, the Montreal-born president of the World Jewish Congress, the Presidential Medal of Freedom, the United States' highest civilian honor. Bronfman was honored, in part, for spearheading efforts to retrieve assets of Holocaust survivors and heirs of its victims. Also honored were former U.S. presidents Jimmy Carter and Gerald Ford.

Poland Rejects Lawsuits

WARSAW — Poland is rejecting the validity of lawsuits recently filed in the United States for the return of property seized from Polish Jews after World War II. Such lawsuits should be filed in Poland, a Polish government lawyer said last week. A spokesperson for the Polish government added that the lawsuits were "unprecedented slander," adding they are unnecessary, since compensation or the return of property would be possible under a proposed restitution law.

President To Resign

GEORGETOWN, Guyana — A Jewish grandmother who succeeded her husband as president of Guyana, says she will resign because of poor health. Janet Jagan, born Janet Rosenberg, succeeded her husband, Cheddi Jagan, who died in March 1997. Last year, Jagan paid a visit to Toronto to thank Ve'ahavta, the Canadian Jewish Humanitarian & Relief Committee, for its delivery of medical aid to the South American country.

New Holocaust Museum

BUENOS AIRES — Holocaust survivors in Argentina are organizing Latin America's first museum dedicated to the Shoah. The building is scheduled to open here next April. Exhibits will include artifacts and documents donated by individuals and families of some of the 8,000 survivors who arrived in Argentina after the war.

Reward Offered

MOSCOW — Moscow Jewish leaders are offering a $10,000 reward for information leading to the arrest of those who attempted to blow up a Lubavitch synagogue in the centre of the Russian capital last month. A bomb was discovered July 25 in the Bolshaya Bronnaya synagogue and safely defused shortly before a ceremony attended by some 200 people, including many small children, was due to begin.

Van Gogh Drawing Returned to Jewish Heir

BERLIN — German officials have returned a van Gogh drawing to the heir of a Jewish collector forced by the Nazis to sell his art holdings at a fraction of their value.

The move, which came more than 60 years after the drawing was subjected to a forced sale, was one of several recent developments related to the return of property to Holocaust survivors or their heirs.

The van Gogh drawing and two other works of art were returned to Gerta Silberberg, 85, of Great Britain.

She is the daughter-in-law – and only surviving heir – of Max Silberberg, who was forced by the Nazis to sell a collection of Impressionist and Expressionist works that have been valued at $60 million at today's prices. He later died in a concentration camp.

The drawing, Olive Trees, has been in museums in Berlin and the surrounding area since 1935, when Silberberg was forced to auction off his collection.

Two more paintings from his collection have been identified in the United States and Russia, but terms for their hand-over have not been reached.

Toronto Police report 11 anti-Jewish hate crimes

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Eleven of the 110 hate-motivated crimes that took place here during the first six months of the year were anti-Semitic in nature, according to a Toronto Police Service report released last week.

The anti-Semitic incidents – among them one assault, one case of criminal harassment and two of threats – made up the vast majority of the 13 religious offences reported.

In addition, there were 34 "multi-bias" offences, which include racially motivated offences as well as those against Jews and gays.

The report, presented at last Thursday's police services board meeting, defines hate crime as "a criminal offence committed against a person or property that is based upon the victim's race, national or ethnic origin, language, color, religion, sex, age, mental or physical disability, sexual orientation, or any other similar factor."

The incidence of anti-Semitic and other hate crimes apparently decreased in 1996 and 1997, but the overall incidence was up 19 percent over the same time period last year.

"Is it hate crime on the rise, or just more people reporting?" asks Ellen Cole, chair of Community Relations, Canadian Jewish Congress – Ontario region. "We have a sense that it's both."

The increase is "unquestionably significant," according to Sol Littman, director of the Canadian branch of the Simon Wiesenthal Centre, which began conducting Internet training sessions for police in recent months.

"It's hard to be dogmatic about what causes [the increase], but certainly one of the things we have noted is the vast increase in the use of the Internet by young people," Littman said.

Electronically communicated hate messages have become "a major concern," confirms the report. Hate groups implicated by the report, whether through flyers, voice messages or other means, include the Ku Klux Klan, Last Call International, the Original Canadian White Bloor Boys, Aryan Nations, Movement to Restore Decencies and Aryan Blitzkrieg.

The average age of suspects, however, has increased from the 18 to 25-year-old category to those between ages 26 and 40.

In previous years there were "considerably" more assaults than other offences. This is the first year, since police began compiling records on hate crimes in 1993, that wilful promotion of hate offences were almost as prevalent as assaults, with 29 of the former, 30 of the latter.

The CJC's Cole is pleased to note a commitment on the part of Toronto police to combatting hate crimes by increasing the number of officers designated in that area. "That's a big step," she said.

At the initiative of CJC, a multicultural, multi-faith group has begun meeting with Police Services to offer input in the area of hate crimes.

Montreal MP Finestone appointed to Senate

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — A split is already appearing within the Mount Royal Liberal Association over whether the riding, now vacant with the appointment to the Senate of Sheila Finestone, should continue to be represented by a member of the Jewish community.

Association president Marc Leiter said, "It is definitely not at all a guaranteed Jewish seat."

But Sidney Margles, immediate past president, said Mount Royal, which has a majority Jewish population, should have a Jewish MP.

Finestone herself indicated she feels the same way. Mount Royal's MP "needs to remain the standard-bearer of the concerns of the Jewish community," whether they live in the riding or not, she said.

Finestone, 72, was first elected in 1984 and was re-elected three times. The riding had previously been held – since 1965 – by Pierre Trudeau, and before that by Allan McNaughton for many years.

Who would succeed Finestone has been the subject of speculation for years, and especially since 1996 when Prime Minister Jean Chrétien dropped her from the cabinet and many thought she would not seek a fourth term. She had been secretary of state for multiculturalism and the status of women.

A byelection must be called within six months after a seat becomes vacant, Leiter said. The Mount Royal byelection may be held the same day as that in the Toronto-area riding that was held by Sergio Marchi. That date has not been set.

There are still five vacancies in the Senate to fill, and it is possible Chrétien may appoint other long-serving MPs in order to bring in new faces in government, thereby necessitating more byelections.

In an interview, Finestone said her Senate appointment came as "a pleasant surprise."

She welcomes the new responsibility because she is eager to continue in public service and in the legislative work, for which she has developed a talent. "I see this as a wonderful opportunity for personal growth.

"I have a great deal of respect for the Senate. It doesn't deserve its bad image. There's a lot of hard work going on. Sure there are slackers, as there are in the House of Commons," she said. The upper house, she believes, has an important role in the legislative process because of the time its members can put into study and consultation.

Finestone, who will serve 2½ years before the mandatory retirement age, affirmed that she is not going to be an absentee senator. "I'm too conscientious for that."

She stated she will not collect her parliamentary pension during her time in the Senate.

At the time of her appointment, she was chair of the standing joint committee on official languages and was a member of the standing committees on justice and human rights and foreign affairs and international trade.

She expects to continue many of her international interests, which lately have included the effort to eliminate land mines. She will also continue as Canadian president of the Inter-Parliamentary Union, a United Nations affiliate.

Among the highlights of her Commons career, she listed her work on the broadcasting and copyright law, expanding the rights of the disabled, enhancing the place of women, and the new privacy law, on which she has been working for the past two years.

The political theatre

It's an annual event. The 10 premiers and three territorial leaders convene to discuss the state of the Canadian federation. The discussions take place in two venues: one on camera; the other off camera.

The reason the event is important is the off-camera discussions. These are held behind closed doors, beyond the prying eye of the camera and the audiological intrusion of the microphone.

In a country as regionally diverse as Canada, it is vital that the leaders of the different regions are aware of each other's problems and understand each other's respective concerns. Of course, there can be not even the beginning of mutual understanding unless there is honest communication and unencumbered exchanges of ideas. But there can be no serious communication among the parties unless there is some relationship among them, both formal and informal, based upon the trust that evolves from the freedom to speak freely and privately.

The public often underestimates the extent to which politics is personal, the extent to which individual contacts and ties of friendship among holders of high office can be the sinew that binds together the body politic during storms and other political buffetings.

The reason the event is entertaining, sometimes sadly so, sometimes amusingly, is because of the on-camera discussions.

These discussions are held out in the open, as it were, usually in a carefully choreographed media "scrum" in which the leaders, looking relaxed, are either on their way to the meetings or are standing in a congenial arc around a microphone after the meetings. Indeed, the microphone is the very reason for these "discussions."

The leaders are not talking to each other. They are "talking" to the voters.

The eye of the camera is not prying; nor is the microphone intruding.

Rather, the camera and the microphone are the electronic canvas, on which the leader carefully attempts to paint his own image.

These "discussions" are concerned more with public relations than with interpersonal or intergovernmental relations; they are full of theatre rather than of thought. As a result, the public tends to discount, if not actually dismiss, their importance.

The conference that concluded last week in Quebec City was the perfect premiers' meeting paradigm.

Off-camera, the discussions seem to have been substantive. Significant regional differences were apparently sufficiently reconciled to enable a consensus document to be released. At the same time, the premiers were afforded an opportunity to renew old acquaintances and to build bridges and establish new acquaintances.

On camera, the discussions were the usual entertainment fare of posing and puffing, the tone of which was set by the premier from the country's largest province.

As if on the set of an action cowboy western, Premier Mike Harris of Ontario arrived at the conference with guns blazing, indelicately discharging a hale of income tax cut bullets at the federal government.

In the ensuing spray of "gunfire" some of the bullets ricocheted in the direction of the other premiers.

"We are now bringing the example of Ontario to the rest of the premiers," boasted Premier Harris.

"If you want more jobs; if you want more growth; if you want more investment; if you want a prosperous economy; if you want sustained revenues in your government coffers, you better cut taxes and you better be competitive," he offered.

"I know there are doubting Thomases and there are governments that are doubting Thomases. They're the ones that have high unemployment, high numbers of people on welfare; they're the ones with the lowest growth; they're the ones with the lowest job-creation record and I'd like to help them all."

The premier's bruising offer was politely, but forcefully and publicly, turned down by all of the other leaders except Lucien Bouchard and Ralph Klein.

The majority of the premiers, apparently aware that Ontario is regarded by at least one environmental watch group as the second worst polluting jurisdiction in North America after only Texas, and that it still has an annual, multi-billion-dollar operating deficit, appear not to want the "example of Ontario."

Israel's trade envoy says goodbye to Canada

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Yael Varsano-Barzilay

TORONTO — The past four years have been good ones for Yael Varsano-Barzilay and, not coincidentally, for Israel, in terms of its business connections with Canada.

Varsano-Barzilay's four-year term as Israel's trade commissioner and economic affairs consul to Canada comes to an end this week. She is being succeeded by Benjamin Noy, who held the position in the early 1990s.

Varsano-Barzilay is returning to Israel, and has been offered the position of director of the North American division, Foreign Trade Administration.

Prior to assuming the post in Toronto, the 36-year-old native of Petach Tikvah was deputy director of the division and a member of the Israeli team of negotiators working on the Canada-Israel Free Trade Agreement (FTA), which came into force Jan. 1, 1997.

In Canada, she presided over offices in Toronto and Montreal. The experience has been "very versatile and interesting, meeting an array of people, handling different problems, and meeting challenges," she said in an interview last week.

Although she wouldn't have taken the position without a love for Israel – "It's difficult for me to sell something I don't believe in" – her stint here has deepened her appreciation of what Israel has to offer.

Among other attributes, she cited a striving toward excellence "that you find in a lot of Israelis, especially – but not only – in high tech."

Varsano-Barzilay has come to love Canada too, she said, and was particularly taken with the melding of work and volunteerism she's seen here. "It struck me as a good combination."

When she arrived in Toronto, Varsano-Barzilay became the first woman to hold her position in North America.

She is happy to report that the scenario "has totally changed." She now has female counterparts in Atlanta and Los Angeles – meaning that, at the end of her tenure, three of Israel's seven economic posts in North America were held by women.

Varsano-Barzilay's young age, rather than her gender, sometimes came as a surprise, but she said it was a non-issue once it came to "tachlis, or discussing what was on the table."

On the other hand, there were potential benefits. "You stand out more. I guess people remember you more," she said.

During her time here, Varsano-Barzilay and her staff initiated and organized trade missions for different business sectors, and "opened doors" – arranging contacts, setting up meetings, giving advice – for a variety of companies in the initial stages of doing business with Israel. Two Canadian International Trade ministers, Art Eggleton and Sergio Marchi, visited Israel while she was here.

"You plant seeds," said Varsano-Barzilay of her work.

She doesn't always see the fruit of her labor, because her office steps out of the picture once a deal is struck.

"Frankly, there's not always time [for follow-up]," she said. "You're on your next project. And sometimes companies don't like to give out the information."

But she is pleased to note an increase in prominent Israel-related business stories appearing in Canadian newspapers like the Financial Post, the Ottawa Citizen, and the Gazette in Montreal.

Since the implementation of the FTA, there has been a 70 percent increase in exports of Canadian goods to Israel and a 50 percent increase in exports of Israeli goods to Canada. In 1998, two-way trade between Canada and Israel exceeded half a billion dollars (US)

"These are staggering numbers," said Varsano-Barzilay. "There's still some growing to do, but we're certainly on the right track."

Rabbi Barry Schneider Honoured

A "Friendship and Appreciation Reception" was recently held at the home of Irving and Hilda Pisarek in honour of Rabbi Barry Schneider and his wife, Barbara marking 21 years of dedicated service as Rabbi at the Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue and to the Toronto Jewish Community.

Those present at this large gathering were but a small representation of the many people whose lives they touched. Among the guests were congregants, prominent members of the community, clergy and the chaplaincy.

The evening overflowed with great warmth and emotion as tributes of respect, admiration and love for the entire Schneider family were expressed.

Theatre, plays on the agenda

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The "exquisite burdens" of Jewishness are the stated focal point of one play at Ashkenaz, Aug. 30 to Sept. 6 at Harbourfront, but many of the theatre and dance pieces at this festival of new Yiddish culture also have this quality.

Ashkenaz '99

These "burdens," which can bring both laughter and tears, are in evidence, for example, in the Canadian premiere of O Wholly Night and Other Jewish Solecisms written and performed by Deb Margolin.

Solecism, a rarely used word, means a misuse of language, and in the play, Margolin gives a personal account of how these solecisms enriched her life.

Reviewers in both the Jewish and the non-Jewish press have described her play as breathtaking, insightful and imbued with the sense of waiting for the Messiah.

Gabrielle Lansner and Paula McGonagle in MAGDA/Holocaust Stories.

Jewish people, she says, are sitting on a fire escape watching people go by, enjoying the sights, while they wait.

The bittersweet aspect of Ashkenaz, with the accent on the bitter, is again the theme in the Canadian premiere of the dance-theatre piece, Holocaust Stories, by Gabrielle Lansner and Company from Brooklyn. This is an adaptation by Lansner, the acclaimed director-choreographer of The Jewish Wife by Bertold Brecht and two short stories by Cynthia Ozick, which are combined to tell the story in dance and text of the relationship of two women, an aunt and her niece, and the aunt's loss of her baby Magda in a concentration camp.

The New York Times hailed Holocaust Stories when it was first staged in New York as a memorable production. It was a theatrical coup for Ashkenaz to garner it for Toronto.

The Jewish Wife is the story of a Jewish woman who decides to leave her Aryan husband in Germany in the 1930s and head for Amsterdam ahead of the Holocaust. Brecht's story infers, and Lansner expands on the inference in her choreography, that the Jewish wife was leaving a troubled marriage with a husband enamored of Nazi physical ritual.

Perhaps one of the quintessential theatre pieces of Ashkenaz will be the Canadian premiere of Diamonds in the Dark by the Travelling Jewish Theatre of San Francisco, an acting ensemble of Corey Fischer, Naomi Newman and Albert Greenberg.

The production is a blend of 15 pieces of 20th-century poetry by Yiddish poets and post-modern music. The result is what reviewers have termed an evocative and subtle recapitulation of what Jewish poets have contributed to understanding human nature.

As the San Francsico Chronicle put it: "Diamonds in the Dark gives voice to the Yiddish poets' passionate struggle to bear witness to the secular, mystical and political realities of our time."

Adding diversity and another touch of humor to Ashkenaz is the Canadian premiere of Shtick! A Queer Play on Jewish Vaudeville written and performed by Sara Felder of San Francisco.

The festival's program describes Shtick! this way: "Radical performance and gender-bending vaudeville from San Francisco's best-loved juggling Jewish lesbian theatre artist. A colorful and hilarious mosaic of comic clowning and searing satire from a performer who wowed audiences at the first-ever Ashkenaz with her June Bride."

Under the same heading is the world premiere of I Just Wanna Jewify: The Yiddish Revenge on Wagner by local writer Michael Wex, presented by Golus Storytheatre.

Deb Margolin performs O Wholly Night and Other Jewish Solecisms.

Using music, storytelling, sight gags and instruction in Yiddish to make its point, it begins with the assumption that the main characters of Wagner's operas, especially those of the Ring-Cycle, are in fact Orthodox Jews. Then it gets weird.

Ashkenaz is also presenting a cerebral Canadian play, The Kabbalistic Psychoanalysis of Adam R. Tzaddik, by Anton Piatigorsky and directed by Chris Abraham of Moriah Productions.

Freudian psychotherapy and the Kabbalah collide in this drama, which is a realistic presentation of the difficulties one Jew goes through in trying to get at the truth.

For dates and times of performances of these plays and other events at Ashkenaz, call Harbourfront Centre Information, 416-973-3000. The box office number is 416-973-4000.

Brian Morris steps down as CIC national chair

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Brian Morris has resigned as national chair of the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC), preferring not to extend his mandate by a third year.

Earlier this month, Morris tendered his resignation from the top lay post at the lobby group after leading it for nearly two years. He had the option of staying on for another year, "but I'm burned out. When I see I can't do something effectively, I prefer not to do it," he told The CJN.

Joseph Wilder of Winnipeg will take over as CIC chair. Wilder, 63, also a lawyer, will complete Morris's term. Wilder had been nominated to become the next CIC chair anyway, and could be re-appointed as such in a year.

"I've decided not to do a third year. I'm just too busy," said Morris, a 53-year-old Bay Street lawyer and former national president of B'nai Brith Canada.

"Being the top spokesperson for Canada-Israel relations is one of the most important, if not the most important, positions in the Jewish community," he said. "It's important that Canada speak with one voice on Israel."

The CIC, he noted, is also where all of Canada's national Jewish organizations iron out their differences. "Friction is eliminated at the CIC table. It's the only place where the entire community can sit down and speak with the same voice.

"The CIC is famous for generating consensus."

Morris took over the organization in September, 1997, at the same time as the forged Canadian passport scandal blew up in Israel.

Mossad agents were found to be carrying faked Canadian passports in a botched bid to assassinate a Hamas leader in Jordan. Ottawa recalled its ambassador to Israel, and the affair had the potential to irreparably harm Canada-Israel relations, despite apologies from Israel, and promises to discontinue using Canadian documents in future spy missions.

But relations survived, and remain strong.

It was under Morris's tenure that the CIC began lobbying members of the Knesset. Until then, "Canada wasn't exactly on their radar screens." The efforts have paid off, he said, and CIC professionals, as well as Wilder, will be back in Israel later this month to talk about Canada with MKs, cabinet ministers and possibly, Prime Minister Ehud Barak.

A continuing CIC highlight is sponsoring visits to Israel by Canadian parliamentarians. Last month, the CIC took nine members of Parliament and one senator on a tour of the Jewish state.

"We've been very good at targeting up-and-coming MPs [for the annual trips]," Morris said. "A few of them have gone on to cabinet."

The CIC under Morris also met on several occasions with Foreign Minister Lloyd Axworthy to discuss a wide variety of issues, including to convey Canadian Jewry's concerns about Ottawa's voting record at the United Nations.

Over the past two years, the CIC has taken issue with at least three Arab-sponsored UN resolutions that were supported by Canada. The lobby slammed Canada's support of the resolutions as unfair to Israel, saying Ottawa's voting pattern threatened to harm not only the peace process, but its own role in it.

Most recently, the CIC deployed its trademark quiet diplomacy to persuade Canada to try and have a global conference on Israel's post-1967 territories postponed. The conference, which Canada voted to have, took place but fizzled after only a few hours.

"We would like Canada to play a more even-handed role at the UN," Morris said.

Two Jewish seniors attacked near shul

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Police are investigating the beating of two Jewish men, age 66 and 79, that took place last Friday evening at about 7:15 p.m. on Viewmount Avenue near Torah Emeth Jewish Centre.

The younger man sustained a badly swollen eye; the other, a Holocaust survivor, had a bruised forehead, nose, cheek and lower lip.

Detective Don Ryan of Metropolitan Toronto Police, 13 division, said as he was beginning an investigation Monday morning, that the case was being treated as an assault.

Two suspects may have used a chrome bar or pipe in the incident, he said. Police had a description of only one suspect, a 19-year-old white male, 5-foot-10, 150 pounds, with short hair and wearing dark shorts and a cream-colored shirt.

No remarks were made by the perpetrators to indicate it was a hate crime, Ryan said, but the police Hate Crimes Unit is involved in the case.

Without wanting to "cause undue alarm," Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, is treating the incident as a hate crime, said Danny Roth, CJC public affairs and communications director.

Hatred and cowardice: evil's twin pillars

It would be a grave mistake to dismiss Buford O. Furrow Jr. as "sick," "deranged," "beset by demons," or more simply, as a "nut." Despite the fact that reasonable and decent individuals cannot fathom the thinking – we must refer to his mental processes by some term – that so totally twists the values of a man, we must resist characterizing Furrow as "ill." For to do so, would wash away any criminal culpability and moral responsibility for his shooting last week of five people at the North Valley Jewish Community Centre of Granada Hills near Los Angeles and for the murder, later that same day, of postal worker Joseph Ileto.

Buford O. Furrow Jr. is evil.

Last week, Tuesday morning, Buford O. Furrow Jr. entered the Jewish community centre and fired more than 70 shots from a submachine gun at the Jews in his path. These Jews were three boys between the ages of five and six, a 16-year-old girl and a 68-year-old woman. Not wishing to engage in combat any law enforcement officers, Furrow fled the scene after spending his cartridges on those five Jews. Miraculously, the five survived.

About an hour later, from behind the wheel of a car he had stolen, Furrow spotted 39-year-old letter carrier Joseph Ileto at a mailbox.

The New York Times records what happened next. "Mr Furrow stopped his car and asked Mr. Ileto if he would mail a letter. Mr. Ileto agreed. Mr. Furrow then pulled a Glock Model 26 pistol from his back pocket and shot Mr. Ileto twice…The mail carrier bent over and attempted to run away…He [Furrow] then shot the mail carrier a few times in the back until he saw the mail carrier fall to the ground face down…Mr. Ileto was shot at close range nine times."

As Furrow told police investigators, he killed Joseph Ileto because Ileto was a "non-white target of opportunity," and he tried to kill the five Jews because he "wanted to send a wake-up call in America to kill Jews."

Furrow's ideology is hatred and his methods are craven, cowardly violence. They are the twin pillars on which all white supremacists would build their "new" society.

Like all his fellow travellers in the sinister world of vile bigotry, racial prejudice and white supremacy, Buford O. Furrow Jr. is evil. This is the stomach-churning truth that we must acknowledge. It is also the starting point for any strategy we must adopt if we are to successfully rid society of such radical malevolence. Though the incident last week took place in the United States, the common elements of that strategy apply in Canada as well. They are:

- constant vigilance against the activities of white supremacists;
- a willingness to prosecute the purveyors of hatred and the perpetrators of violent crime, to the full extent of the law;
- a commitment to restrict and to control their access to guns;
- the ongoing re-affirmation, through our education system, of the paramount importance of democratic values; and
- an unshakable resolve to live our lives each day by those values.

This is the only certain way to vanquish evil and to knock down the twin pillars.

Backs Levitts in case before beit din

In The CJN, Aug. 5, you reported on the case against the three rabbis of the Kashruth Council of Toronto (COR). As I understood the case, the objection was not so much that the food was not kosher but that the owners were not observant of the Sabbath.

But what about the owners of the dairies and soft drink companies and the butter and flour people, and all the other foods which are suddenly kosher at Passover and other occasions? They are not even Jewish, and certainly do not keep the Jewish Sabbath! Perhaps they keep their own Sabbath! I certainly hope that the rabbis lose their case, although one cannot help but feel that the beit din will be influenced by their status.

I think that if Levitts loses the case, we should immediately put a ban on so called kosher food processed in Toronto. After all, what is good for the goose – etc. etc.

Some countries tried in vain to rescue Jewish children

Re "Canadians recall Transport" (CJN, July 29).

I believe it would be of importance to these former "Kinder" and your readers to set a record straight, which is long overdue.

England was not the only country that participated in the rescue of Jewish children after the fatal pogrom of the Nazis on Nov. 9, 1938, known to us and unfortunately still referred to by the Nazi name of "Kristallnacht."

Holland took over 2,000 children in Kindertransporten, and Belgium and France about 1,200. This is unfortunately forgotten, as most of those "Kinder" were caught by the invading German armies and murdered by the Nazis in the Shoah.

Israeli veteran with crutch rides cycle jump seat

Billeted in homes throughout the Jewish community, disabled veterans like Eliahu Ben Ovadia are here annually as guests of Aid to Disabled Veterans of Israel/Beit Halochem Canada. Aid to Disabled Veterans of Israel/Beit Halochem Canada was founded in Canada 21 years ago. Through Beit Halochem Canada, the annual two-week period of dinners, outings, special concerts and quiet time, exposes members of the Jewish community to the unique challenges faced daily by each and every disabled Israeli veteran. This personal contact gives Diaspora Jews a better understanding of life in Israel and the important role that Diaspora Jews play in Israel's well-being.

These veterans attempt to carry on a normal life. Only through subtle indications is one aware of the soldier's debilitating injuries. Ben Ovadia, for example, travelled as a passenger on his host's sport motorcycle. For two hours, he rode through King City and the Holland Marsh clutching his aluminum crutch with his left hand and holding the driver with his right. His beaming wide, childish grin never left his face.

The driver, needing to stop to ease the discomfort of sitting in one place for 90 minutes, asked if Ovadia needed to rest. His response: "I live with pain always, sometimes more, sometimes less. I'm liking this so much, I don't care to feel anything…it's OK."

Paris memorial denigrates Jewish martyrs

Having recently returned from Paris, my family and I want to register our distress and indignation as a result of visiting the mémorial de la déportation adjacent to the Cathedral Notre-Dame de Paris. It proclaims the martyrdom of "200,000 unknown Frenchmen" shipped for "extermination in the night and fog."

As you well know, 80,000 of them were rounded up with the collaboration of the French police, not because they were Frenchmen, but because they were Jewish.

Poland's Jews refuse to give up

By RABBI DOW MARMUR

The only functioning synagogue in today's Warsaw is run along strictly Orthodox lines. Most members of the congregation aren't Orthodox; many aren't even halachically Jewish. But, as one of the leaders, Dr. Stanislaw Krajewski, explained recently to a group from Holy Blossom Temple in Toronto visiting Warsaw, only a few old men who know the liturgy as they learned it before World War II attend synagogue regularly. They keep the services going.

They know nothing of Conservative or Reform Judaism. The majority of the 400 members of the congregation, many of whom are familiar with American and European Jewish ways, may have preferred a different liturgy, but they lack the competence and the commitment to change things.

That's why the outgoing rabbi of the Warsaw congregation, Rabbi P.M. Joskowicz, is a strictly Orthodox Chassid. Even though he hasn't reflected the stance of the members, and at times he has embarrassed them with his bad Polish and lack of savoir faire, his newly appointed successor is also Orthodox – albeit much younger and perhaps more flexible.

The other congregations in Poland have no rabbis, but they have adopted similar solutions to the discrepancy between what happens in the synagogues and the way the members live. A few ardent adherents run the services; most of those who attend can hardly follow. But without the former, the synagogues couldn't function.

While in shul one Shabbat in Cracow last April, in the famous Remu Synagogue (named after Rabbi Moses Isserless), I noticed that the president of the community didn't even open a prayer book during the service. At one point, he invited me for a chat. When I suggested that we talk after the service, he told me that he was about to leave to meet an important visitor. In response to my raised eyebrows, he said that he only comes to make sure that there is a minyan. Once the quorum is in place, he can attend to other matters.

Many years ago, attending a Shabbat service in the synagogue in Warsaw, I found myself standing next to a man who didn't open a prayer book throughout the service. He told me that he came every week. He said: "As a very young man during the Nazi occupation I was saved by a good Polish Christian woman. I subsequently married her daughter. I don't know any Hebrew and next to nothing about Judaism, but I need the company of fellow Jews, so I come here regularly."

The situation of the Jews in today's Poland isn't comparable to anything the readers of this paper may know. Apart from the few old men – they are often married to non-Jewish women – who remember the old ways and want to preserve them, the congregation consists of the generation of their grandchildren (their children were often atheists and members of the Communist party) who have found Judaism in the last few years in search of identity and purpose. They depend on the old to pray for them, at least for the time being.

A few have become Orthodox. When, again last April, I was invited to give a talk on liberal Judaism by a group in the Warsaw community, the notice announcing the talk on the congregation's billboard was accompanied by a plea from the president, a member of the new generation of seekers, not to deface the poster but to come to my talk to challenge me. The poster wasn't defaced, but the would-be opponents didn't turn up either.

To enable "people of Jewish origin" to explore their roots, a telephone hotline has been established to which individuals can respond "in strictest confidence." Many do. Some take it further; others remain undecided and confused.

Many more don't deny their roots but profess indifference. Poland's foreign minister is such a Jew, as are several academics and journalists. Their opponents may, of course, at times play "the anti-Semitic card" against them, but that's not the only card that's played in today's Poland.

A member of our group was taken to his family's hometown by a very competent guide and researcher of local Judaica. When asked if he was Jewish, he replied, "I'm not sure." He may suspect that one or both of his parents or grandparents are Jewish, but they have obviously sought to hide it from him. They may have retained the habit from the war years, when they were in hiding, and continued with it as party activists when the country was ruled by Communists.

Contrary to my normal habit, I wear a kippah all the time when in Poland. As a child after the war there, I did my best to hide my Jewishness; today, coming from Canada, I want to proclaim it. I'm of a generation of Polish Jews who survived "by accident." My parents and I found ourselves on the Soviet side after the outbreak of World War II. Now I need to celebrate my survival in gratitude to God and by proclaiming my Jewishness.

Walking the streets of today's Polish cities and villages, as many Jewish visitors of all stripes do, is a way not only of seeking roots but also of bearing witness that am Yisrael chai, the Jewish people live. Hitler didn't get his victory, after all.

A man more fascinated by the Jewish people than most is a Catholic priest and academic in Lublin. When he was 35, his mother told him that he wasn't his parents' natural child. In 1943, days after his birth and just before the liquidation of the ghetto in his town, he was handed over by his birth mother to the woman he has always known as his real mother.

She knew very little about his family, not even their name. After years of search he found his father's brother in Israel and friends of his birth mother. He has remained loyal to the only family he has known, faithful to his Catholic religion and priestly calling.

But he keeps in touch with his Jewish roots, even though it adds to the confusion about his own identity. He has even added his father's surname to his. Father Professor Romuald Waszkinel of the Catholic University of Lublin is now Romuald Jakub Weksler-Waszkinel, a specialist in French philosophy, particularly the Jewish thinkers Henri Bergson and Emmanuel Levinas. He is one of the most attractive human beings it has been my privilege to know.

Why should a Jew want to live in Poland now? When Marek Edelman, the last surviving commander of the Warsaw Ghetto uprising and a resident of Lodz, was asked the question when he visited Canada some years ago, he answered, in characteristic Jewish fashion, with a question: Why should a Jew want to live in Canada? For him, Poland is home. Many of the young Jews who seek their way back to Judaism say the same thing. It's not for the visitor to question their commitment to their country.

For Poland isn't only what those who left it long ago remember. It's changing and a sizeable proportion of its citizens are anxious to help Jews find and preserve their roots. Yes, there's anti-Semitism, but it's not the dominant feature in today's Poland.

Jewish-Christian relations, spearheaded by Krajewski and supported by the American Jewish Committee, play an ever growing part in Polish life today. Having lectured to several Catholic institutions of higher learning in Poland earlier this year, I have evidence of the importance of this work.

Though the number of people "of Jewish origin" in today's Poland is difficult to determine, the few thousand Jews who are registered either in congregations or in the secular cultural societies are trying to live as Jews. None of us has the right to turn our back on them. They are the witnesses that Poland isn't Judenrein (clean of Jews), after all.

With the help of the Polish government and thanks to the support of foundations from abroad, a few imposing synagogues are being restored, notably the liberal temples in Cracow and Wroclaw (formerly Breslau). Though they aren't likely to be used for regular services, they'll be vehicles for the promotion of Jewish life.

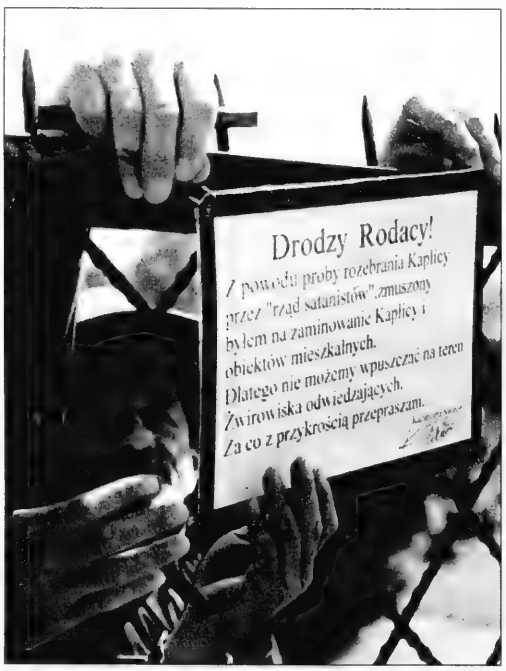
Recently a highly successful festival of Jewish culture was held in Cracow, and thousands of Poles attended. One of the concerts was held in the temple, currently under reconstruction.

Those who have affiliated with congregations want their children to be Jewish, too, whatever the Halachah may say. Hence the establishment of Jewish kindergartens, even a day school in Warsaw.

If several American Jewish organizations – notably the Lauder Foundation, the Joint Distribution Committee and the American Jewish Committee – are prepared to offer help, why should we refuse to show solidarity?

The main reason why Jews from abroad – secular Israelis no less than Chassidim from Brooklyn – come to Poland is kever avot, visiting the mostly unmarked graves of millions of Jews who perished there during the Holocaust. It's a painful but noble undertaking.

And then there's a second reason: to tell the small band of fellow Jews who struggle to live as Jews in the country of their birth that we are with them. Because they refuse to give up on Judaism, it behooves us not to give up on them. This undertaking may be more bewildering than painful, but it's no less noble.



An angry Pole attaches a sign last May, on a gate outside Auschwitz, advising that he has mined the area to prevent authorities from removing the crosses erected there by religious radicals.

The why of PNAI

From time to time, I have occasion to follow the fate and fortune of PNAI, which is the abbreviation for Parents of North American Israelis. There are chapters in most of the large cities, yet it is one of the few Israeli-connected organizations that has a low profile and is probably unknown to many readers.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

In a recent letter to me, the organization pointed out a variety of reasons why one should join:

- Our common bond is that we have children, grandchildren and great-grandchildren who live in Israel.
- We are a self-help group of volunteers who are engaged in addressing the concerns of our children and all olim.
- Our membership is comprised of parents who come from every corner of the Jewish mosaic.
- Presently, there are 45 chapters established in most of the major communities throughout North America. Four of them are in Canada – in Montreal, Ottawa, Toronto and Winnipeg.
- We are an extended family and meet in the spirit of mishpachah.
- To the best of our knowledge, we are the only Jewish organization that does not solicit funds.
- We do not become involved in taking positions on matters concerning politics or religion.
- We are the most frequent travellers to Israel and most of us go there for periods of from two to three months.
- Because we have children living in every sector of the Israeli economy and because we have contact with many people in positions of authority, we are the best-informed group on every aspect of Israeli life.
- Parents who are leaving for Israel are only too happy to take along letters or small parcels. This pigeon carrier service has come in handy during mail strikes. Quick communication with our children was particularly outstanding during the Gulf War.
- Our head office in New York is manned entirely by unpaid volunteers, as are all our executive positions throughout our entire organization.
- Our local chapter publishes a monthly newsletter called The Toronto GESHER. It announces the next meeting and contains a variety of topics. Every effort is made to keep our members informed on changes in the law and many other little known points of information about such things as travel, accommodation, banking, wills, where to go, what to see, which can result in substantial savings in time and money for our members.
- We are making an effort to cement a close relationship with the Israeli community. They too have children in Israel, many of them serving in the IDF. Because of this common bond, we are the only organization in the established Jewish community that has a chance of breaking down the barriers that exist between the two communities.
- A special arrangement has been made with the Canadian Jewish News to have the paper delivered to their children in Israel at a very low cost.

Although I have no children or grandchildren living in Israel, I have been invited to join PNAI, and I may do just that.

The Jews of B.C.

A research project now underway in British Columbia has reinforced my deep respect for Jews who came to Canada over the past century and more. Last year, I wrote about the Jewish community of the Yukon. Now I want to tell you something about the Jews of British Columbia.

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

Recently, the Jewish Historical Society of British Columbia and the Jewish Genealogical Institute have undertaken a pilot project to collect family histories of the Jews of British Columbia. This pilot effort will help to determine the feasibility of a project that would reach every Jewish household in the province, asking them to tell the story of their families on their way to, and since their arrival in, the province.

Although the project is small and just beginning to collect responses, it provides a fascinating glimpse into Jewish history in Canada. The goal is to create an archives for historians and family researchers to use in writing the history of the province, as well as the history of its Jewish community.

While early Jewish immigration to Canada was concentrated in the eastern and central provinces of Canada, the northern gold rush brought significant, if small, numbers of Jews to the west coast in the 1850s.

Early Jewish settlers came up from the United States to Victoria, moving to Vancouver after it became the railroad terminus. They went further, into the northern towns where gold miners were followed by railroad dreamers, and provided air transport, goods and professional services to towns like Prince Rupert, Prince George, and to the vast outback of B.C. and the Yukon.

The origins of B.C.'s Jewish community are as wide as the Diaspora. They range from a family whose roots go back in Victoria to the 19th century community there, to newcomers from Russia and Sarajevo, South America and South Africa. They range from people who remember living in the small shingled houses that once covered our now-glittering downtown core and people who remember the streetcars that crossed miles of bush to get to the city, to people who came here from Europe in 1912 with nothing but their ambition, to people who came from Europe in 1949 with nothing but terrible memories. All these are the lives we need to document.

Jews have been on all sides of the class conflict inherent in the economic system since they arrived here. As shopkeepers, pedlars and draymen, in small shops open from early morning to late at night where husband and wife worked side-by-side, the people so despised by the Nazis built a sturdy urban economy on the one hand, while on the other, they infused with prophetic zeal the attempts to organize labor and protect the workers.

Jews in British Columbia have long been active in the political life of the province. Jews from Victoria sat in the provincial legislature. David Oppenheimer became the first mayor of Vancouver and shares the credit for creating Stanley Park. (Ironically his park got the name of Stanley, while Oppenheimer Park languishes in the heart of our infamous downtown east side.) Local boards have had their Jewish chairs and members, and active members of councils and municipal committees have labored to preserve our architectural legacy and serve the multicultural population of our cities.

But the history of Jews in political life is also about Jewish radicals, members of the United Jewish Peoples' Order, who, with a vision of social justice, attempted to remove the imbalances of the economic system and introduce a more just and equitable society. Their contributions will be part of the history.

The cultural life of the province also profits from the energy of Jewish arrivals. We have artists and supporters of museums, musical life and theatres. And while we have our share today of beautiful people in the local social columns, many of those are also philanthropists in both the Jewish and the general worlds.

Today's social historians don't just write about the Oppenheimers. They write about the lives of children and the struggles of families to make a living. They write about capitalists and communists, Jews on both sides of the barricades. They write about the lives of women on the frontiers and those in service organizations that sustained other newcomers until they could find their way. They write about women shopkeepers and women sweatshop workers.

All these are the stories we seek. From these threads we will weave our historical tapestry.

Summer camp's importance

About a week ago, my wife and I were invited to a dinner party at a friend's home. Usually, the conversation on these evenings is fairly predictable. We sit around drinking diet cola and talking about either the successes of our children or the failures of the Jewish community. When we tire of these subjects, we focus on our recent exploits in running or mountain biking or golf.

Bruce Elman in Edmonton

Each time we have these conversations, our times for 10k are faster, the single track we rode is more treacherous, or the numbers of birdies we sank increases. Sadly, this is social discourse of people in their late 40s and early 50s. This particular evening started out no differently.

We were talking about our children and which camps they were attending for the summer. This led us down memory lane. Everyone had stories of their own camping experiences in different parts of Canada, the United States and South Africa. I loved hearing these stories.

I delighted in the story about how the children from South Africa would go to camp on a special train – 1,000 Jewish youngsters each sent off by their mother with two chickens to tide them over until they reached the camp! The biggest headache for staff was figuring out the sleeping arrangements on the train.

It reminded me of my own camp experience. Children from Cape Breton used to go to Camp Kadimah by train. Sleeping arrangements were organized by the rebbitzen, Mrs. Kenner. In 1957 – my first year at camp – Mrs. Kenner had me share a berth with a kid from Glace Bay by the name of Sandy Siegel. During the night, Sandy pushed me out of the berth. Even with that rocky beginning, Sandy and I became the best of friends and remained so through university. I regret that lately we have not been in touch with one another.

The stories were humorous and touching, but, at their core, they spoke to the importance of summer camps in the Jewish Diaspora experience. It is not surprising that Jewish continuity is seen, in part, to be based upon summer camps.

So I was taken aback, when, a few days later, I read Jennifer Fox's column in the July 29 issue of The Canadian Jewish News. She writes: "I am fairly certain the summer of '99 will be the last time I work at day camp. The idea of being 22 and still at camp doesn't appeal to me." In the journalism business, it is probably bad form to comment on the opinions expressed by fellow columnists, but what came to mind was the old adage: "Youth is wasted on the young."

I think it is difficult to overstate the importance of summer camps in Jewish communal life. Summer camps teach the value of communal involvement and foster the development of community leadership. I am always astounded by the large number of community leaders and professionals who point to summer camps as an essential component in their Jewish development.

Summer camps encourage a concern for the welfare of klal Yisrael and cultivate a love for Eretz Yisrael. At summer camp, we learned about the plight of Russian Jewry and the miracle of the establishment of the State of Israel. The first time I read Arthur Hertzberg's The Zionist Idea was at summer camp.

Along with a strong Jewish home, good Jewish schooling, active Jewish youth groups, and exciting Israeli experiences, summer camps provide an important foundation for Jewish continuity in the Diaspora. They are, incidentally, great fun.

I consider myself to be a bit of an expert on summer camps. I was a camper at Camp Kadimah from 1957-63. From 1964 -65, I attended Camp Biluim. I was a counsellor staff at Kadimah from 1966-68. Thirty years ago, in 1969, we founded Camp Machar, the senior camp at Kadimah. I was the head of Machar from 1969-72, and in 1972 and 1973, I directed Camp Kadimah.

I am not ashamed to say that much of what I am today I can trace back to the influence of these camps.

Rather than succumb to Jennifer Fox's negative view on camping, I would adopt the view expressed by her fellow columnist, Erica Horn, that "you are never too old for camp."

Therefore, I am looking for a Jewish summer camp that wants a resident constitutional expert on its staff. Yes, it's true that a resident doctor is useful, but what you really need is an expert on constitutional matters. Interested camps should reply to The Canadian Jewish News. (By the way, my wife, Nancy, designs and makes silver jewelry and Judaica so she could probably help out in arts and crafts.)

P.S. Jennifer, in 1957 my counsellors were Alan Ross from Newfoundland and Harold Medjuck from Halifax.

The Kirshner File

Russia grapples with upsurge of anti-Semitism

A year ago this week, Aug. 17 to be precise, the Russian ruble collapsed, plunging Russia into a financial crisis from which it has yet to recover.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

The collapse of the ruble, combined with the political instability and the loss of empire which accompanied the fall of communism in 1991, has brought with it an upsurge in open anti-Semitism.

On a recent trip to Moscow, U.S. Secretary of State Madeleine Albright declared that anti-Semitism has become one of the leading issues Russia must grapple with as it gradually transforms itself into a free-market democracy.

There is a weary sense of déjà vu as anti-Semitic incidents scar the Russian landscape. Russia, after all, is no stranger to anti-Semitism. Under the czars, it flourished, with peaks and valleys of intensity. And during much of the Communist era, though officially outlawed, it was sanctioned by the government.

The dissolution of communism not only spelled finis to state anti-Semitism, which stunted two generations of Soviet Jews, but also touched off a process of revitalization in the Jewish community.

Emigration, mainly to Israel and the United States, diminished but did not sap the community's vitality. Jews who remained behind took to nascent capitalism like fish to water. The opportunities for success in Russia's gold-rush milieu seemed limitless. Here was an emerging society which, in part, placed a premium on talent, resourcefulness and hard work.

The bubble burst with the sinking of the ruble. Dark, violent tendencies which had been virtually kept in check, first by the heavy hand of communism and then by the rising tide of prosperity, reemerged abruptly.

In a replay of the past, Jews are widely being blamed for Russia's descent into insolvency. Since last August, several synagogues and Jewish community centres have been bombed and vandalized, Jews have been physically and verbally assaulted, and politicians on the national, regional and municipal levels have pandered to anti-Semitic prejudice.

Last month's stabbing of Leopold Kaimovsky, director of the Jewish Cultural Centre in Moscow's Choral Synagogue, is symptomatic of the virulent strain of anti-Semitism which has coursed through Russia's body politic of late.

Politicians have set the tone by denigrating Jews and holding them responsible for Russia's ruination. Once again, Jews are the convenient scapegoats.

The villains of the piece are members of the Communist-dominated parliament, the duma: Gennady Zyuganov, leader of the Communist party, and Albert Makashov, a former general.

In an open letter to his constituents in December 1998, Zyuganov dwelled on Zionism rather than Jews, a popular ploy in Communist times. Comparing Zionism to fascism, he described Zionism as an "aggressive, imperialist" ideology whose goal is "world supremacy."

Harking back to a theme adopted by the Black Hundreds in the late 19th century, Zyuganov ascribed Russia's "catastrophic situation" to the "destructive role of Zionist capital" and the "Zionization of governmental authorities." And in a menacing allusion, he spoke of the "non-national oligarchy" which controls Russia's economy.

Shorn of its code language, Zyuganov's diatribe was a classic example of unvarnished anti-Semitism. His unspoken targets were Russians of partly Jewish descent, as well as outright Jews: Yegor Gaidar and Sergei Kiriyenko, the former prime ministers; Anatoly Chubais, President Boris Yeltsin's ex-advisor; Boris Nemtsov, a provincial governor; Boris Berezovsky, a Jewish convert to Christianity and supposedly the wealthiest person in Russia; and Vladimir Goussinsky, a tycoon who heads the Russian Jewish Congress.

Last October, Makashov, who blames Russia's woes on Jews, went one step further than Zyuganov by calling for the expulsion of "all Yids" from Russia. His remarks caused an uproar in the duma, but a mild proposal to censure him was roundly defeated in November, as was a similar motion last April.

He remains unchastened. In an interview six months ago, he accused "Zionism and its representatives" of "destroying our government." Ominously enough, Makashov plans to run for the presidency in next year's general election.

One of his supporters, Viktor Ilyukhin, chair of the duma's defence committee, has charged Jewish members of Yeltsin's "inner circle" with committing genocide against Russians.

Zyuganov, surprisingly, criticized Makashov for his "intemperance," but added that Russians of Jewish origin are over-represented in government and finance. As he put it last January: "Too many people with strange-sounding family names mingle in the internal affairs of Russia" and are "undermining Russia's distinctive character."

Boris Yeltsin

Emboldened by the likes of Zyuganov and Makashov, lesser political figures have engaged in anti-Semitic rhetoric. In February, the governor of Krasnador, Nikolai Kondratenko, branded Zionism as a threat to the stability of his region. In late July, the Communist mayor of Stavropol, Mikhail Kuzmin, praised Alexsandr Barkashov, head of the Russian National Unity, an anti-Semitic militia whose recruits wear black military-style uniforms and greet each other with stiff-armed salutes.

It would be facile, however, to suggest that the far right and the extreme left have an exclusive monopoly on anti-Semitism. Commenting recently on the well-known rivalry between Berezovsky and Goussinky, Viktor Chernomyrdin, the former prime minister, reportedly said, "It comes out that two Jews have clashed, and now the whole country has to watch this farce."

Chernomyrdin's remark, which elicited applause from no less a rabble-rouser than Makashov, is significant for two reasons. It panders to the notion that Jews are contemptible. And, as Moscow's chief rabbi, Pinchas Goldschmidt, has noted, it has created the fear that the "Jewish card" may be played in the runup to December's parliamentary election.

Regardless of whether Jewish issues cloud the election campaign, the majority of Russians, about 75 percent according to a recent survey, believe that all citizens should enjoy equal rights, while 56 percent think that ethnicity should not be a factor in a person's appointment to a government position.

In line with these sentiments, Yeltsin, in early August, issued his first public condemnation of anti-Semitism, and pledged to find and punish anti-Jewish vandals.

Yeltsin made these promises to Prime Minister Ehud Barak against the backdrop of a number of encouraging developments. In the autumn of 1998, he ordered his ministers to draw up legislation to curb hate crimes. In January, the same month as prosecutors launched a criminal investigation of Makashov, the Russian cabinet approved a draft bill prohibiting statements which fuel ethnic strife.

In March, Prime Minister Yevgeny Primakov said that he supported legislation designed to clamp down on extremist groups. In May, his successor, Sergei Stepashin, who was dismissed last week, declared that he was committed to fighting anti-Semitism.

Strangely enough, the bill which Yeltsin's cabinet has been considering for months now, has yet to be passed. Russia already has hate crimes legislation on the books, but it is vague and has not been enforced.

Exploring heaven, hell

Books
Bernard Baskin

The Pope has startled and confused me (just think of the faithful) with his recent declaration that heaven and hell are not actual places but states of mind.

What does Judaism teach on the subject? There is no doctrine of heaven and hell in Judaism. The entire matter is relegated to the realm of Aggadah, the plaything of the imagination, where freedom of interpretation and elaboration are permitted and encouraged. It became part of the folklore of the people, appealing and fascinating, but never a dogmatic doctrine.

One can find almost every view expressed, from the most sublime to the ridiculous. Rabbinic and medieval literature records them all, no matter how contradictory they sometimes are.

In biblical times the Jewish afterworld was not divided into heaven and hell, but was all of one piece called Sheol (pit). There, under the earth, the dead, good and bad alike, lived forever in a sort of shadowland, a twilight state, in which there was neither pleasure nor pain.

Sheol, however, played little part in Jewish thought, because the ethical plan of biblical Judaism and its system of reward and punishment were all this-worldly. God's justice and God's mercy were not delayed to a future time, but were expressed in this life.

But such a faith could not long stand up against the facts of life. Our ancestors began to see that righteous people suffered and wicked people triumphed. Scholars and saints were burned at the stake, while the arrogant and the brutal lived off the fat of the land.

The old simple faith in a this-worldly repayment for both virtue and evil-doing had to be replaced with a longer view. If judgment did not obtain on earth, then injustice must be redressed in another world. A just God would not permit any less. And so gradually – before and during the time of the Maccabees – the belief in the future life began to take shape.

The Hebrew terms of heaven and hell, Gan Eden and Gehenna, refer to places on earth. Gan Eden is where God placed the first man and woman to taste of all the good that earth offered. Originally, then, Gan Eden was here. Later, the Jewish mind transferred its bliss to another world – to the heavens above.

And Gehenna, too, which later became the appellation for hell, is the name of a valley south of Jerusalem, Ge-Ben-Hinnom, the Valley of the Son of Hinnom, where, according to biblical accounts, the wicked indulged in acts of abomination, where they sacrificed their children to Moloch. It was the accursed valley here on earth, and, to the Jewish mind of later days, it became a fitting symbol for the abode of the wicked in the life beyond the grave.

For some Talmudic rabbis there was a higher and nobler conception of reward and punishment. The reward of a mitzvah or good deed is the deed itself, even as the punishment for an averah or sin is the consciousness of guilt itself. A person is to pursue the good for the sake of good.

"Be not like servants," is the classic advice of Antigonos of Socho, "who serve the master for the sake of receiving reward; but serve him without the condition of receiving a reward."

This explains why the idea of heaven and hell never took hold in the mind of the Jew to the same extent it achieved among others. Subconsciously the Jew felt that good must be done for the sake of good; that he must serve God through love and not through fear of hell or the reward of heaven.

And that is why, a great sage of the third century, Rabbi Simon ben Lakish, could boldly declare: En Gehenna L'atid Lavo, "in the future that is to be, there will be no Gehenna, no hell!" He taught: "God will take the sun out of its orbit, and in its light the righteous will be healed and the wicked judged!"

Although Jewish ideas of heaven and hell remain ambiguous and non-dogmatic, the belief in some form of immortality is basic to all forms of Judaism.

Advice from the dating experts

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Today I conclude my look at Jewish dating and the Internet with advice from the real experts – the daters themselves.

Setting out on a date requires a great deal of fortitude, something that Martin Bodek has analyzed in fine detail [http://members.aol.com/thebodie/#narc]. From The Call, to The Breath Test, to The Conversation, Bodek has been there and offers his experience.

Here's Bodek on The Time Check: Checking your watch is sometimes necessary but always subliminally insulting to your date. There are several methods you can employ to ensure she won't notice. The first method is to wear a digital watch since the swiftest glance will give you the exact time. The second trick is to point behind her, and yelp, "Look! Tom Cruise!" and sneak a peek while she searches in vain. Method number three is to glance at her watch while her eyes are on her food.

Not only is Rachel Furman looking for a special person, she has also put together a great site for other people doing the same thing [http://www2.acd-pc.com/~rsusselj/frameset1.html]. There is a nice list of Jewish shidduch sites, chats, forums and message boards. Furman has also written a detailed essay on how to create A Letter of Interest.

She says she receives many e-mails from men who have seen her Web site and want to know more about her but tell nothing about themselves. Bad move. She says you must share something about yourself, your hobbies, your priorities and make sure to let your personality shine through.

You really have to admire the dedication of Yaron Engelstein, the guy who put together the Dating Assistance for the Jewish Male page [http://www.google.com/search?q=cache:391385&dq=cache:www.angelfire.com/ny2/yaron2/].

Engelstein has culled links from all over the Internet to tell men how to put their best foot forward on the night of the date. There's the Male Guide to Selecting an Outfit. (This should help take the strain out of guessing. Now she won't ask, "What was he thinking?") You'll also find the Virtual Exercise. (It's 30 minutes till date time and you just realized that you haven't worked out in months...Not to fret, there's still hope. Visit this site for the five-minute biceps you always wanted!).

And if your date is taking place in New York, Engelstein has provided links to practically every attraction, museum and comedy club in the Big Apple.

Looking for love can be wonderful – and painful. Especially if you've been hooked up with the wrong matchmaker along the way. Michael Jacobs has been there and has founded The Official Shidduch Survivors' Club [http://www.geocities.com/Paris/Louvre/3376/index.htm]. He includes tips about how to find the right shadchan. "Good Sign: Keeps notes on a printed form. Bad Sign: Scribbles on the back of cigarette packets."

And to let you know that you are not alone in your quest, there is a selection of Shidduch Horror Stories – like what to do when you realize that your blind date is someone you've already dated.

By the way, perseverance has paid off for Jacobs. This year, "after literally years of searching" he met Tamara Shira Hershfield. After a whirlwind five-week courtship, the Jacobs were engaged. They are now married and living in the Jerusalem suburb of Kiryat Moshe [http://www.geocities.com/Paris/Louvre/3376/engagement.htm].

LEGAL NOTICE BY ORDER OF THE COURT

To victims of Nazi persecution and their heirs who may have claims against Swiss Banks or other Swiss entities relating to the Holocaust:

Swiss banks agreed to pay $1.25 billion U.S. dollars to settle legal claims relating to the World War II era conduct of Swiss banks, Swiss businesses, and the Swiss government ("Swiss Entities").

The United States District Court for the Eastern District of New York (the "Court") will hold a hearing on November 29, 1999, to decide whether the Settlement should be given final approval.

Note that you may be included even if you did not have a Swiss bank account, and that this Settlement is different from the Swiss Humanitarian Fund.

Who Is Affected by the Settlement

You are affected by the Settlement if you fit into one of the following five Settlement Classes. Four Classes consist of "Victims or Targets of Nazi Persecution" (any individual, business or group persecuted or targeted for persecution by the Nazi Regime or its agents, because they were or were believed to be Jewish, Romani, Jehovah's Witness, homosexual, or physically or mentally disabled or handicapped), AND who:

1. Had assets on deposit with any Swiss bank, investment fund, or other custodian, prior to May 9, 1945, OR
2. May have claims against Swiss Entities relating to assets looted or taken by the Nazi Regime*, OR
3. Performed slave labor for entities that may have deposited the revenues or proceeds of that labor with or transacted that profit through Swiss Entities, OR
4. Unsuccessfully sought entry into Switzerland to avoid Nazi persecution, or after gaining entry, were mistreated, and may have related claims against any Swiss Entity.

The fifth Settlement Class includes any individual, whether or not a Victim or Target of Nazi Persecution, who performed slave labor in a work site, wherever located, owned or controlled by a Swiss Entity.

All Settlement Classes include heirs and successors of the persons and entities described above.

Even if you're not sure whether you are a member of one of the Settlement Classes, you should request a Mailed Notice and Initial Questionnaire. For example, if you performed slave labor, you may not know whether revenue or proceeds of that labor were deposited with Swiss Entities; you may still be a Settlement Class member.

How and When Claims will be Paid

No claims process or Plan of Allocation has yet been established. The Mailed Notice explains how you can make suggestions.

To receive further notice of a claims process, and ensure that you are able to file a claim, you must either mail a request for such notice to the address below, or complete and return the Initial Questionnaire attached to the Mailed Notice.

If the Court gives final approval of the Settlement, a Plan of Allocation will be adopted and the Fund will be disbursed. Not all Settlement Class members who apply will be eligible to receive payments.

If You Do Not Want to Participate

If you do not wish to participate in or be bound by the Settlement, you must exclude yourself by writing a letter so indicating, to the address given in the Mailed Notice, by October 22, 1999. If you do not, you will be barred from prosecuting any legal action against Swiss Entities relating to the settled disputes. If you exclude yourself, you will NOT be able to claim a portion of the Fund.

How to Comment or Object

You may comment on the terms of the Settlement by October 22, 1999. The Mailed Notice describes how to submit comments or objections. You have the right to appear at the November 29, 1999 hearing in person or through counsel, although you do not have to.

Who Represents You

The Court appointed attorneys as Settlement Class Counsel, and appointed Settlement Class Representatives, including Holocaust survivors, the World Jewish Restitution Organization ("WJRO"), and the World Council of Orthodox Jewish Communities. You do not have to personally pay the Court appointed attorneys. Certain attorneys will apply to the Court for reimbursement of their costs, up to about .2% of the Fund. Certain Plaintiffs' attorneys will also apply for fees, up to at most 1.8% of the Fund. The Court may award a lower amount. Most attorneys will not apply for fees, and counsel for the WJRO will not apply for fees or costs.

Scope of Release

The Settlement of this case (In re Holocaust Victim Assets Litigation, Master File No. CV-96-4849) concludes all legal actions and disputes against Swiss Entities relating to the Holocaust, World War II, Victims or Targets of Nazi Persecution, the Nazi Regime, treatment of refugees, or any related thing. The term "Swiss Entities" (or "Releasees") includes Credit Suisse and UBS AG (successor to Union Bank of Switzerland and Swiss Bank Corporation), and their former and current corporate parents, subsidiaries, affiliates, and branches; the Swiss National Bank; other Swiss Banks; the Swiss Bankers Association; the Swiss Confederation (including the Swiss government); all business concerns headquartered, organized or incorporated in Switzerland as of October 3, 1996; and certain other affiliates of Swiss concerns described in the Mailed Notice. Certain claims against various Swiss insurance companies listed in the Mailed Notice are not included in this Settlement.

* The second Settlement Class also includes claims against Swiss Entities relating to "Cloaked Assets," which are assets disguised by a Swiss Entity for the benefit of an Axis company or person associated with the Nazi Regime, between 1933 and 1946.

Canadian Jews urged to mark millennium in Israel

By NICOLE SALAMA
Student Intern

TORONTO — With the millennium fast approaching, many people may be considering a special travel destination for a memorable vacation to mark the new era.

Instead of a cruise, or the yearly pilgrimage to Florida, tourism consul Arie Shevy-Shibi, the director for the Canada Israel Government Tourist Office, is encouraging Canadian Jews to visit Israel, the "official destination of the millennium," he says.

According to Shevy-Shibi, most of the tourists who come to Israel are not Jewish. He notes that 65 percent of all visitors are Christian and it is estimated that during the millennium the number will rise to 90 percent .

This troubles him. He says the percentage of Jewish visitors to Israel should be higher – he would like to see at least 10 percent of the 350,000 Jews living in Canada visit Israel annually.

He says the Israeli government tourist office appointed 17 honorary Canadian tourism ambassadors to encourage Jewish Canadians to visit Israel; these ambassadors help promote Israel and ease safety concerns that might be keeping Canadian Jews away.

He says he wants to "open people's eyes" to the fact that there is "no danger, [and Israel is] as safe as any other country."

Shevy-Shibi notes that there is "formal co-operation between Israel, the Palestinian Authority, Jordan and Egypt to promote the region as a whole."

Expressing optimism about the impact of the new Israeli government on tourism, Shevy-Shibi says there is now a "more genuine and sincere co-operation and understanding between Israel's government and the Palestinian Authority...The peace process and tourism go hand in hand."

Shevy-Shibi stresses that not only does Israel offer historical vacations, but visitors can also participate in adventure tours or just relax on the beach. In addition, he says, Israel is planning numerous special events, ranging from museum exhibits to music and dance festivals, from now until the end of the year 2000.

According to Shevy-Shibi, tourism, one of Israel's fastest growing industries, is second only to technology.

He says the 2.3 million tourists who visit Israel annually generate $3 billion (US), and this revenue should increase by 30 percent in the year 2000 as three to four million people are expected to visit Israel.

In response to concerns about cost, Shevy-Shibi says "prices have been steadily dropping" and that travel agents will have "affordable tour packages and bargains of the millennium."

He says that all those people who visit Israel during 2000 "will be a part of a world-wide movement that will bring millions to [Israel] to celebrate this grand new era. They will enjoy a combination of beauty, friendship and spirit like in no other place in the world."

Parents as teachers

By RABBI JAY KELMAN

Guest Voices

It is a time honored Jewish tradition to study mishnayot in honor of a departed member of our community. The traditional reason given for this custom is the fact that the Hebrew letters of the words Mishnah and neshamah (soul), are interchangeable. This custom, though, is not just based on word games, but reflects a deep insight into the proper role of parents and teachers.

The written Torah that was given on Sinai is in reality quite a small book, and even though authored by God Himself, does not and cannot deal with all of life's eventualities. The Torah was therefore accompanied by a much broader oral law, a law that is entrusted to the sages of each generation to apply to life's evolving circumstances.

This oral law was not allowed to be written down and was to be passed orally from generation to generation, from teacher to student. But morals, ethics and even Halachah (law) cannot be mastered from book knowledge alone. Torah can only be effectively taught by a living example. Actions really do speak louder than words. It is the student-teacher bond that gives Torah its vibrancy and relevance to our daily existence.

The writing down of the oral law into the Mishnah in the third century of the common era occurred due to the tragic historical circumstances of exile and dispersion. There was a real fear that if not put in writing, the bulk of Jewish law would be forgotten. But in submitting the oral law to writing, the living words of Torah would now be confined to words on a page.

It is our parents who are our primary teachers. It is no coincidence that the Hebrew words for teachers and parents, morim and horim, come from the same grammatical root, a root which means to point, as teachers and parents point us in the proper direction of life. It is they who are entrusted with the holy task of teaching their children how to live their lives as God-fearing Jews.

And of course, parents teach by being a living Torah. Children will rarely listen to what parents say unless their words are followed up by action. The child-parent bond is what ensures that Torah will be passed down to the next generation. When a parent passes away, that living legacy is lost.

Nevertheless, just as the study and development of Torah continued after the compilation of the Mishnah, we must continue to develop the legacy of our parents even when the oral transmission is lost.

Acceptance of the yoke of heaven means striving to bring peace to this world both on a personal and on a communal level. "And you shall love thy neighbor as yourself" is, as Rabbi Akiva has taught us, the most fundamental axiom of the Torah.

The laws of the Mishnah teach us how to bring heaven unto earth, to bring peace to this world. We lost our Temple and hence some of the presence of God, due to sinat chinam, bickering amongst us. There can be no acceptance of the yoke of heaven without peace. The Mishnah begins by recording the earliest time to say the Shema but if it does not end with peace, then our acceptance of the yoke of heaven is deficient.

One can only attain ultimate peace in the world to come. This world is, in the words of our sages, an alam sheker, a false world where nice people often do finish last, where cutting corners often pays, where material possessions are often valued more than mitzvot.

Our soul yearns for spirituality while our body yearns for physical pleasure. This inner turmoil can only be fully resolved when our soul returns to our maker.

Yet, one who truly accepts the yoke of heaven is one who is at peace with himself and knows that when the time comes to move unto the next world he will receive just reward. Let us ensure that we say the Shema properly so that we can attain the blessings of peace.

Jay Kelman is associated rabbi at Beth Jacob Anshe Drildz Congregation in Toronto. The above is a partial synopsis of a talk he gave in honor of the shloshim for his mother, Ruth Kelman.

Help us move into our new home.

The new Apotex Centre, Jewish Home for the Aged, and The Centre for Neurovascular Disorders is going up.

It's going up at a tremendous pace.

The concrete shell of the building is complete. Anticipation is building. The walls of resident rooms are going up, the plumbing's going in and the wiring is being installed. Residents are looking forward to moving into a new facility that's much better equipped to meet the needs of seniors.

And their anticipation will be rewarded. The rooms will be bigger, and all rooms will be private. Each room will have an entrance foyer and an ensuite washroom almost twice as large as in the current building.

This excellent new facility has been made possible by the generosity of our community. It's a wonderful achievement. If you have made a gift, please accept our thanks. If you haven't, please consider making a contribution to the ongoing work of one of the finest seniors' facilities anywhere.

For more information on how you can be part of completing the Apotex Centre, Jewish Home for the Aged, and the Centre for Neurovascular Disorders, call Shirley Worth in the Baycrest Centre Foundation at (416) 785-2500, Ext. 2013.

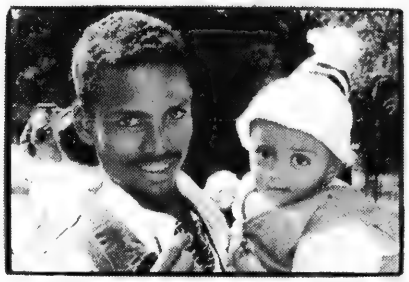
Rescue Resumes in the Fall

by Adi Neuberger

Torrential rains have temporarily suspended the Jewish Agency's efforts to rescue the few hundred Jews remaining in the remote Ethiopian town of Quara. The dramatic rescue operation, which brought 1,400 Quara Jews to Israel over the past few months, will continue in early fall when heavy seasonal rains, preventing passage from Quara to Jewish Agency processing camps in Gondar, end.

"There is no way for these people to make the three week journey by foot to Gondar," explains Shlomo Molla, a Jewish Agency worker who, 15 years after immigrating to Israel, has returned to his birthplace to rescue his fellow Jews. "The rain makes it impossible."



Many of the Quara Jews recently arrived in Israel with nothing but their children and hope for the future.

Quara Jews line up at the Gondar refugee camp to be processed for aliyah to Israel.

In the meantime, Molla will continue to oversee the massive absorption of newly-arrived Quara Jews who are slowly adapting to life in their new country. "It's not easy for them," says Molla, who travels daily between ten Jewish Agency run absorption centres across the country. "Many have never even seen electricity or running water."

"Even though the actual rescue is beginning to wind down, this is only the beginning," says Mike Rosenberg, Director of Immigration and Absorption for the Jewish Agency. "We are trying to prepare close to 700 children who have never seen the inside of a classroom, to begin school in September."

Efforts to complete the final stage of the Quara rescue are expected to resume in late September.

Back to School for Epi

Dr. Seymour Epstein learned many important lessons about Jewish education during his 18 year hiatus from Toronto. Now, as the new Executive Director of UJA Federation's Board of Jewish Education (BJE), he's looking forward to sharing them with his hometown community.

"I'm glad to have the opportunity to come back to work in a community that takes Jewish education so seriously," says Epstein, known to colleagues as "Epi."

His career, both in formal and informal Jewish education, includes a doctorate from the University of Toronto, teaching at Montreal's McGill University and Camp Ramah and finally as education consultant for the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee - a UJA Federation partner organization responsible for assisting the Jewish poor and revitalizing Jewish life in communities around the world.

Since 1981, Epi has worked on behalf of the JDC in Jewish communities from Morocco to Siberia, where he served as Director of Jewish Education and was responsible for community development. "Issues of Jewish identity are different yet similar no matter where you go," says Epi. "The common thread from the perspective of education is to offer students as much exposure to these issues as possible."

High on Epi's priority list are teacher training and promoting BJE as the community's central resource for Jewish education. In a letter of introduction he recently sent to hundreds of educators, Epi encouraged teachers to visit the BJE's pedagogic library, teacher centre and media centre.

Seymour Epstein

"The BJE should ultimately provide each and every school with the materials and expertise they need to do the best job in educating our children."

Budget Boosts Services

jewish toronto

The new UJA Federation budget is providing nearly $3 million more than last year for programs and services to assist the vulnerable, fortify Jewish identity and rescue Jews in danger. The increase results from the record-breaking 1999 annual campaign which raised $40.5 million.

"For the first time in many years, we are able to increase funding to our beneficiary agencies, which are struggling to keep up with growing demands and government cutbacks," says David Engel, who is co-chairing the upcoming Campaign 2000 with Mel Wolfond.

Of the new fund $550,000 is going to Jewish Family and Child Service for financial assistance to the Jewish poor, programs for abused women and children witnessing violence, volunteer visits to hospitals, nursing homes and other institutions, and subsidies that allow disadvantaged children to attend summer camp. New dollars are also supporting life-saving hunger relief for poor elderly Jews in the former Soviet Union and Orr Shalom group homes in Israel for neglected and abused youngsters who cannot live at home.

More than 150 UJA Federation funded chaplaincy volunteers visit hundreds of community members in hospitals, nursing homes, prisons and other institutions each year.

The budget also includes financial assistance to Jews for Judaism – Canada's largest counter-missionary organization, Toronto's Ashkenaz Festival of Yiddish and Jewish culture, which is expected to attract close to 100,000 people this year and funds to expand family education programs.

"UJA Federation's support signifies the importance of our work to the community," notes Jews for Judaism director Julius Ciss.

Allocations to the Jewish Agency will help to finance, among other initiatives, aliyah for 2,000 Quara Jews from famine-stricken Ethiopia and the growing number of Jews seeking to flee Russia amidst rising anti-Semitism.

"These new funds have helped to revitalize many of the programs, services and agencies that we support around the world," says UJA Federation President Alan Sandler.

In addition to seminars and public speaking engagements, Jews for Judaism Executive Director, Julius Ciss, confronts Jews for Jesus missionaries on a regular basis.

Through increased funding from UJA Federation Ashkenaz is able to include international theatre groups such as San Francisco's A Traveling Jewish Theatre in its festivals.

Zareinu Grows

Toronto's only Jewish day school for children who are physically and developmentally challenged has a brand new lease on life thanks to new facilities and new funding from UJA Federation.

Zareinu, which serves 55 students with a wide range of special needs, has exchanged its previous cramped quarters for a much larger and more attractive location in the city's north end.

While the one of a kind school, created over 10 years ago, is accustomed to doing a lot with a little, Danny Gordon, Chair of the school's Board of Directors, welcomes the much-needed financial support. "It's very expensive to run this type of school," explains Gordon, who has experienced all of Zareinu's growing pains from its inception. "We strive to offer our students and their families the best in education and support – and that costs money."

Although Gordon says it wasn't until Zareinu partnered with UJA Federation that the school began to make significant progress in fundraising, he maintains the relationship goes beyond dollars. "UJA Federation has been invaluable in helping us raise awareness about Zareinu within the community while, at the same time, being a symbol of the community's commitment to our cause," adds Gordon.

Beth Tikvah gets new associate rabbi

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — At rabbinical school, Rabbi Eli Garfinkel won two sermonizing awards. A onetime championship high school debater, the new associate rabbi at Beth Tikvah Synagogue says that, although he ran cross-country for exercise, debating was his sport.

Now 28, Rabbi Garfinkel was ordained this year from the Jewish Theological Seminary and joined Beth Tikvah at the beginning of July. The position is a first for both Rabbi Garfinkel and the Conservative congregation, which has never had an associate rabbi before.

His mandate is to work with young people and young families.

The rabbi spent five years working at Camp Ramah Wisconsin, first as a Judaica teacher and then as assistant head of education.

He would like to recreate the "Ramah davening experience" at Beth Tikvah, he said in a recent interview. "My goal is to bring the next generation in. I think we have one of the younger populations in Toronto, and I want to keep it that way."

Rabbi Eli Garfinkel

Thus far, he has found Beth Tikvah to be "a very warm and welcoming congregation, a place that has very few pretensions."

The rabbi was born in Stillwater, Okla., and moved at age two to West Lafayette, Ind., where his father, Alan, teaches in the foreign language and education departments of Purdue University and his mother, Sonya, is a social worker in the local corrections system.

A college town located about an hour from Indianapolis, West Lafayette has two synagogues (one Orthodox and one Reform) serving a Jewish population of 1,000. "Because it's a university town, we have a lot of knowledgeable people," Rabbi Garfinkel said.

He grew up in Young Judaea (YJ), attending YJ summer camp in Michigan, and he learned to daven at weekly Hebrew school classes in West Lafayette. Based on his Jewish background, he was "quickly catapulted into positions of leadership" at Hillel during his undergraduate years at Indiana University, where he received a bachelor's degree in Slavic languages and literatures.

A trip to Russia in his third year of university inspired him to study for the rabbinate. "I became very well acquainted with the Jewish community there, and I realized that the fate of the Jewish people mattered more to me than whatever other career goals I had cooking."

Recently, after three years of work, Rabbi Garfinkel completed a a 403-page "summer Chumash," Mikraot Ramah, now being used at several Ramah camps. On quick examination, it appears attractive and user-friendly, with plain-language commentary on the 14 seasonal parshiot, and evidence of the rabbi's sense of humor in some of the titles and subtitles.

Rabbi Garfinkel honed his writing skills during university as a columnist for the Indiana Daily Student. Sometimes he angered readers, he said, by his continuous defence of Israel in his columns.

He wasn't always so impassioned about Jewish issues. Like many young people, he "took a break from Judaism for a while." Those years coincided – propitiously, as it turned out – with his involvement in competitive debating.

"I think debating helps you academically," he said. "It helps you with Talmud. It helps you to be able to think logically, to write papers. I think it was good preparation for rabbinical school.

"I think, when I came back to Judaism, the fact that I'd been spending those years honing my mind with debating skills meant I could jump back in."

Petah Tikva to honor Morocco's late King Hassan II

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Petah Tikva Anshe Castilla Congregation will honor the late King Hassan II of Morocco next week.

The Aug. 25 event, which is open to the entire Jewish community, will include brief speeches, a 45-minute film on the king's life (provided by the Moroccan consulate), and refreshments.

The program will be conducted in English, and is scheduled to begin at 8 p.m. at the synagogue.

Speakers include Abdelkader Lecheeb, ambassador of the Kingdom of Morocco.

"The king of Morocco always considered his Jewish subjects as very special subjects and always protected them," Carlos Laredo, president of the congregation, told The CJN.

Laredo, who spent the first 20 years of his life in Tangiers, remembers his parents telling him that Hassan II's father, Mohammed V, stood up to the Nazis, declaring, "We don't have Jews here. We have Moroccan subjects."

He also noted the efforts of Hassan II – who died last month after ruling for 38 years – in "promoting tolerance and peace between Arabs and Jews in the Middle East."

During the Inquisition, Morocco opened its doors to the Jews, Laredo said. "We have to thank Morocco and the kings of Morocco for protecting the Jews. This is a big thing. We always have to be thankful for that."

On Campus

Excavating and getting credit for it

By SHOSHANA BRICKMAN
Special to The CJN

Although it's barely 5 a.m., we are fully prepared for our day. Like many other summer visitors to Israel, we are outfitted with cameras and water, sunscreen and wide-brimmed hats. Unlike most, however, we are wearing hiking boots and work gloves; we are carrying trowels, buckets, brushes and dustpans.

This summer, we are not only exploring, we are also excavating. Along with 20 other North American students and volunteers who are working side by side with a group of Israeli students, we are earning credits at York University while digging at Tell es-Safi, the biblical Gath of the Philistines, one of the richest archaeological sites in Israel.

Joint York University Bar Ilan project

With Dr. Carl Ehrlich of York University as our guide, we have flown across the world to participate in this summer field school, a dig conducted by the York University Centre for Jewish Studies and the Martin Szusz Centre for Land of Israel Studies at Bar-Ilan University.

The 13-hour flight is more tedious than the usual subway ride to school, but the thrill of conducting class atop Tell es-Safi is well worth it.

Located about halfway between Jerusalem and Tel Aviv, we are bordered on the east by the Judean foothills and on the west by the coastal plain. Each day, we are greeted with a view that includes forests, fields, herds of cows and carob trees.

In addition to studying archaeology through readings and lectures, we are seeing, digging and learning firsthand the history of the Land of Israel.

We have made many spectacular finds. Recently, we uncovered a beautiful figurine dating back to the Late Bronze Age (1550-1200 BCE). The day before that, we found a rhyton (a drinking mug in the shape of a lions head), an unbroken oil juglet, and a perfectly preserved bowl. We've uncovered several complete vessels, as well as ancient olive pits, seeds, toys, beads, jewelry and sea shells.

What were these items used for? How did they come to be left behind in a massive destruction layer? Was there a battle? A fire? Invaders? Although our methodology is scientific, our minds are free to wander; and while we dig through the layers of ancient cities, we all muse about what might have gone on here thousands and thousands of years ago.

While most of us were novices when we arrived, we are now digging, brushing, sweeping, sketching, washing and marking with skill. We have learned how to clean, sort, mark, record and interpret.

With field trips and lectures, weekend outings and the occasional afternoon by the pool (although we work hard, we are not averse to lying around our kibbutz pool after a day of dust and digging), the time has flown by. We might not have time to explore what lies underneath that mud brick wall we just started to expose. What about what lies below this level of shattered pots and jugs?

The stories of Tell es-Safi have been safely stored for almost 7,000 years. Surely, they will remain patiently buried after this seasons dig is finished. But can we wait as patiently? Though we will be back at York this September, many of us are tempted to return next season for the chance to confirm our suspicions about what those Philistines were really up to all those many years ago.

'Heightened state of alertness' after L.A. attack

directives the morning after the L.A. attack, instructing patrols to step up surveillance of all Jewish communal institutions.

Manuel Prutschi, national director of community relations for Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC), said such police directives are routine following a violent racial incident or terrorist attack anywhere in the world.

In the short term, at least, CJC responded to the L.A. shootings by issuing an alert to all its regions, intended to heighten awareness of security at community facilities. The alert advised cities and towns to contact their local police forces and review precautions.

But officials are careful to strike a balance between enhanced security and not creating too much alarm.

"We don't want to turn our community offices into armed camps," CJC president Moshe Ronen told Canadian Press, but, he added the next day, institutions "have been made security-conscious."

This time of year, Congress updates its security manual in advance of the High Holy Days and conducts meetings with police forces across the country.

Ronen called the state of affairs "a heightened alertness. We're asking people to look out for suspicious vehicles and persons." Police "have been extremely co-operative."

Security at some community institutions, especially those with ties to Israel, has traditionally been tight, with cameras, buzzers and guards.

For the last several years, visitors to Toronto's Lipa Green Building, which houses the city's major communal organizations, including CJC, have had to identify themselves to a security guard posted outside.

CJC calls for calm

But no such arrangement exists at the Bathurst Jewish Centre (BJC), which runs a summer camp for about 400 children among its many programs.

However, an off-duty, uniformed police officer appeared outside the BJC the day after the L.A. incident, and will remain there for the time being.

The BJC received "a few" calls from anxious parents following the attack, but it's been business as usual at the camp, said the centre's executive director Deborah Pinsky.

She said the BJC "is doing what everyone else is," namely, talking to the police, reviewing security measures and making staff aware.

In Montreal, the community advised stepped-up vigilance and ensured that police have agreed to increased patrols of Jewish institutions, said Rabbi Reuben Poupko, who chairs the community's security co-ordinating committee.

A conference call took place last week in Montreal among communal leaders, and another was scheduled for this week, Rabbi Poupko said.

Some institutions are considering upgrading their security arrangements in the wake of the L.A. incident, he added.

"No one wants to send out a false message, but we don't want to be cavalier about it either."

CJC is "calling for calm to avoid overreaction," said national director Jack Silverstone. "If any good comes out of [the L.A. attack], it's that people will be less complacent about security. Unfortunately, our community remains at risk."

Congress "has a long-standing security protocol, and we can only urge others to do the same." Silverstone advises Jewish institutions to "anticipate dealing with issues in a normal fashion, but at a higher level of interest."

Visitors to Calgary's Jewish community centre have had to identify themselves before entering, ever since a letter-bomb exploded there three years ago, said spokesperson Riki Heilik.

As well, security cameras and monitors are in place, "and we have been in touch with law enforcement," Heilik said.

In Winnipeg, it's "business as usual," assured Evelyn Hecht of the local Jewish Community Council.

"There's a concern about copycats, but we're not in a state of emergency. [But] there has been a sharpening of our antennae. It's a good thing anyway this time of year."

Police in Vancouver have agreed to step up patrols of Jewish buildings, both inside and out, said Drew Staffenberg, executive director of the Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver.

As far as the Wiesenthal Centre's Littman is concerned, a lot of blame for the rise in violent hate activity can be laid at the feet of the Internet and its proliferation of hate sites.

"The messages that are delivered in the United States are being delivered in Canada as well," Littman said. "The Internet knows no boundaries."

He said the unprecedented increase in Web sites has included a rise in those advocating hatred of Jews.

"Five years ago I don't think there were 50 sites internationally that we thought were significant in relation to hate. Today we've now monitored some 2,000.

"If you have 2,000 sites that are pushing out hate material daily, you've got to figure that somebody is going to take it seriously, somebody is going to act on it."

The Internet's effect "is to legitimize these [hate] groups. Before, they were marginalized. The Web gives them legitimacy."

He said the Aryan Nations, the neo-Nazi group to which the alleged gunman in the L.A. shootings belonged, has a Canadian "branch" operation in Alberta, "but it has risen and fallen over the years."

Two days after the Los Angeles attack, the Union of American Hebrew Congregations (UAHC), the central body of Reform Judaism in North America, issued two pages of security recommendations to its 900 member synagogues.

These include considering additional security, reviewing existing procedures, training staff, checking parking lots and monitoring mail.

However, "incidents of random, senseless violence are exactly that: random and senseless. No metal barricade, bulletproof glass or armed security guard is strong enough to prevent them," the statement says.

Round-the-clock Jewish radio station launched

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — North America's first round-the-clock Jewish radio station began broadcasting here August 6 with little fanfare, but with plenty of ambition.

Radio Shalom went on the air with about half its program content in English and half in French, said president Eric Aouizerats, a businessman who moved to Montreal from France three years ago, and who was instrumental in making the new station a reality.

But it will likely be a while before most Montreal Jews get to listen to it, because potential listeners have to pick up special subcarrier radios that carry the station on an FM-2 frequency not available on the regular FM band and used for several other ethnic stations.

The prices of the units range from $25 to $75.

Aouizerats said they hope to eventually be able to saturate the Montreal Jewish market by setting up the special radios at Jewish grocery stores, bakeries, restaurants, institutions and other Jewish venues, and through a high-profile marketing campaign, including setting up booths at shopping malls.

These strategies, he said, will expose Montreal Jews to the station and entice them to acquire the relatively inexpensive special radios on their own.

He noted that using the same technique, an ethnic Arab station, also using sub-carriers, eventually attracted 80,000 listeners.

Aouizerats says he got the idea of launching the station after arriving from France and realizing that, despite a limited level of local Jewish radio programming, there was no all-Jewish, round-the-clock station. France has 17, including one in Paris.

In 1997, he consulted with such people as Robert Levy of the Grand Rabbinat, and Solly Levy, who has his own Jewish radio show on Radio Ville-Marie and on whose frequency (91.3 mhz) the Radio-Shalom sub-carrier operates (at 92 mhz). Radio Shalom's broadcast signal should be receivable up to 120 km away from Montreal.

Aouizerats applied to the CRTC for a broadcasting licence and was granted one just a few months ago after a two year wait.

Now, from an office on Victoria Avenue in the heart of ethnic Montreal, his plans are to build a completely independent, multilingual and non-profit station for all Jews, which will contain religious, secular and cultural programing, music, interviews and news supported by advertisers.

Almost all the programming will be produced by volunteers in Montreal, he said, with some coming from such countries as France, England, and Israel.

Already, he said, several airlines, restaurants, and travel agents are advertising the station, which can carry 504 minutes of ads per week.

Aouizerats stressed that he intends his station to be completely autonomous and to appeal to all of Montreal's Jews.

"This is lulav radio," he said. "If any part [of the Jewish community] is missing, it is not kosher."

In order to preserve its independence, Aouizerats has not joined any Montreal Jewish organizations

With only a few days on the air at writing, Radio Shalom was still in the midst of getting its final programming grid together, but Aouizerats said it should be finalized by the end of August.

The station's prime time will be from 7 a.m. to 9 a.m., from noon to 1 p.m., and from 5 p.m. to 8 p.m. Stanley Asher, a well-known local historian who has reviewed Jewish books on Radio-McGill (CKUT), is a Radio Shalom vice-president and in charge of its English-language programming.

Franck Sadia, with more than 10 years experience in Jewish radio in Europe, is the station's full-time general manager.

Aouizerats said that Radio Shalom is working towards a major gala for the end of September to promote the station. Plans are to include the patronage of Elie Wiesel, an honorary president of the station, and Roberto Benigni, who made the film, Life is Beautiful.

To make the station more accessible in the future, he said, Radio Shalom is also planning to eventually be available through digitalized cable and even through the Internet.

New Jewish resource site launched on the Web

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Canada and other countries outside the United States are the latest target markets for a comprehensive Jewish resource Web site.

The site, zipple.com, is a one-stop entry point for all things Jewish on the Internet.

"We're trying to bring the Jewish communities around the world all together," says Jeremy Ahto, of S&S Communications in Chicago, the company marketing the Web site.

Using colorful graphics and a logical, organized layout, everything Jewish, through an infinite number of links, is available on the site: Israel, the Holocaust, religion, books, recipes, travel, Jewish dating services and chat rooms, Jewish music, a central list of Jewish charities, Jewish and non-Jewish media, celebrities, communities around the world, and more.

You can ask the rabbi; look for shmurah matzah; check out a Torah reference; log on to a Jewish newspaper; shop till you drop; find out how to keep kosher in Asia; look for candlelighting times in the city you live in; or get a live picture from the Western Wall.

Zipple.com also offers general links such as stock quotations, weather, free e-mail, and conventional search engines such as Yahoo, Snap, Excite, and Alta Vista.

Users can contribute to the site by adding recipes or sending in new content.

The Jewish communities link on the home page brings you to major Jewish world communities. You can be linked to Canada's major Jewish cities, and then be connected to more links within each city. Find a kosher restaurant in Toronto, the address and phone number to the Jewish federation in Calgary, or scores of other Jewish sites.

Zipple.com was conceived by Jory Rozner, a 30-year-old woman from Chicago, who was struck by the Internet's ability to bring the whole Jewish world together.

Rozner said she sorted through all the Jewish sites she could find, searched out a technology firm and paid for Zipple's start-up out of her own pocket.

A lawyer, Thomas Ahto, became Zipple's chief operating officer and helped Rozner put together a business plan to raise funds and generate revenue for the new company.

Since its launch, Zipple.com has drawn media attention, including stories in USA Today, The Chicago Tribune, Boston Globe, and numerous stations in the United States and Israel.

Rozner has said that she chose the name Zipple to set it apart from other Jewish sites.

"I wanted the site to be cool, hip, colorful and fun," she said. "Jews who are already involved in Judaism will go anywhere on the Internet to get the information they need, but you have to make a special effort to appeal to young people and non-affiliated Jews.

"Zipple.com is designed to do just that."

WJCC hands out awards

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — For promotions and marketing man Jeff Lieberman, it was an ideal role.

As vice-president, membership and marketing at the new Rady Jewish Community Centre at the Asper Jewish Community Campus, Lieberman helped boost the membership to more than 5,500 people. The old downtown Jewish Community Centre had only 400 or 500 members.

"It was the most exciting committee to be serving on," says the president of Time Images, which develops promotional products. "Our committee established the membership rules at the new centre [and sold it] to the community at large."

In recognition of his achievements at the centre, and his efforts on behalf of Winnipeg's Jewish community, Lieberman is this year's recipient of the Harry Silverberg Leadership Development Award.

"It is a nice surprise," he says. "I have been involved in the community over the years because I believe in community service. I wasn't expecting any reward. It is really great to be recognized for one's efforts."

In addition to his work at the Rady Centre, Lieberman has been a board member of the Winnipeg Jewish Community Council (WJCC), and will be chairing Shalom Square this year.

He recently received his award at the WJCC's annual Koved evening. Sharing the podium with him was Rietta Floom, this year's recipient of the Max Nathanson Young Leadership Award.

"I am flattered and honored," says Floom, who was born in Ottawa but grew up in Winnipeg. "There are a lot of other people who give of their time to the community and are equally deserving."

Floom just completed a three-year term on the WJCC board, and has been a board member of the Jewish Child & Family Service, a CJA canvasser – she co-chaired Super Sunday two years ago – a board member of the B'nai Brith Jewish Community Camp and co-chair of the Hebrew Bilingual Committee of the Brock Corydon School Parent Council. She has a master's degree in public administration from Carlton University, and is currently a hearing officer with the Provincial Residential Tenancies Branch.

The two awards provide a subsidy toward the cost of going to the General Assembly of the Council of Jewish Federations in November in Atlanta. Both Floom and Lieberman are planning to attend.

Jacobson family gathers in Halifax

By JOEL JACOBSON
Atlantic Correspondent

HALIFAX — More than 100 descendants of Simon Zachariah Jacobson and Elka Spitz Jacobson recently attended a reunion in Halifax.

"This is a real thrill," said Bertha Jacobson Rubin Lazar of Montreal, the only remaining offspring of Simon and Elka of Lithuania. "I appreciate the fact that, at 88, I can still get around to meet and talk to people. I can understand them. I can hear them. What more can I ask?"

Lazar's son Zack, of Halifax, his wife Myrna, and Myrna Jacobson Yazer, a granddaughter of Simon and Elka, did much of the legwork for the gathering.

"Five years ago, my cousin Selma [Jacobson Brothman of Philadelphia] and I talked about a family reunion," said Yazer at the gathering.

"Then last summer, Zack and I agreed to do it. We estimate, quite closely, that there are 280 descendants of Zachariah, his first wife Sarah, and second wife Elka."

Zack interjects, "There were children of my cousins that my children had never met. There were relatives I hadn't seen in a while and some of our family who hadn't connected in decades. It seemed like a good time to do it.

Simon Jacobson, Vancouver, his wife Raisie, Selma Jacobson Brothman, Philadelphia, and Esther Jacobson Silon, Beverly Hills, Calif., were together at Camp Kadimah during the Jacobson reunion in Halifax. Simon, Selma and Esther are children of Samuel (Zionist Sam) Jacobson whose parents were Simon Zachariah Jacobson and Elka Spitz Jacobson. [Zack Rubin photo]

"The fact that many relatives had never met others had a major impact on me."

Zack and Myrna contacted several of their family peers to compile lists, and a letter-writing campaign started in September 1998. By October, after a second letter, responses started coming.

The attendees enjoyed a Friday night Shabbat dinner at Beth Israel Synagogue, a trip to Camp Kadimah where more than 50 of the reunion crowd attended as children, and other social gatherings. The host committee also prepared several picture murals which were greeted with laughter, tears, witticisms, stories and probably a few tall tales.

"This weekend meets my greatest expectations," said Yazer, as she hosted a Shabbat luncheon for relatives from Jerusalem, Rishon Le Zion, Tel Aviv, Boston, Philadelphia, Beverly Hills, Montreal, Ottawa, Toronto, Waterdown (Ont.), and Vancouver.

Simon Jacobs, born in 1854, became Jacobson when he emigrated to Saint John, N.B in 1907. He married Sarah, had three daughters and a son and moved to Palestine where Sarah and the three daughters died. Simon and his son Jacob Simon (Yankel Sander) returned to Lithuania, where Simon married Elka and had seven more children.

Ilga Leja, wife of one of the Jacobson descendants, Howard Epstein of Halifax, accepted the challenge of piecing together the branches and twigs of the Jacobson family.

The result was "a foundation for future research and documentation," she wrote in the foreword to the lengthy booklet she prepared, which identifies each descendant of Simon and Elka, Simon and Sarah, and Ben Zion Spitz, Elka's brother.

Linda Epstein of Jerusalem travelled farthest but returned to her Halifax roots. "This is a sense of history, of continuity," said Epstein of the reunion. "There were several of the family I had not met before and I'm meeting their spouses, too."

She laughs. "I really like a lot of these people. I enjoy them."

Scene in Ottawa

By G.K. SIMCOE

To her staff, she is known as Mrs. Finestone; others know her as Sheila. But few people know that her real name is Grace. Well, even if it wasn't the precise name bestowed on her by her beloved father, Monroe Abbey, 72 years ago, it certainly captures the essence of her honorable tenure in the House of Commons.

Sheila Finestone will now gracefully conclude her parliamentary career as a senator. It is a fitting end for a woman who has made – and presumably will continue to make – a positive and meaningful contribution to public policy.

Her efforts on behalf of Jewish concerns must also be noted. For question period aficionados, she will always be remembered for her sharp chastisement of a Tory minister while she was in opposition: "Il n'a pas ni de guts, ni de courage."

She always knew wherefrom she spoke. Finestone showed her own mettle when she did combat with that unholy alliance of international forces hostile to Israel that gathered in Nairobi in 1985 to pass the odious Zionism-is-racism resolution. She has never backed down from a fight – and almost always, she has been on the side of the angels. (One could quibble about her stand on Meech…but that's another story.)

With Finestone's appointment to the Senate, that most coveted Liberal seat of Mont Royal is up for grabs. Establishment Liberals have quickly moved to discourage any challengers to their anointed successor, Eric Maldoff. Maldoff is a well-known figure within Montreal's Jewish community and very close friends with Eddie Goldenberg, Jean Chrétien's principle advisor, and David Zussman, a Liberal insider's insider.

There are those within the predominantly Jewish riding of Mont Royal, however, who have no special affection for the one-time president of Alliance Quebec. Moreover, a number of credible activists have been waiting in the wings to make a run at the nomination for the safest Liberal seat in the country.

No one has formally come forward, yet. But it is a sure bet that Maldoff will not win the nomination by acclamation – if at all.

The Jewish community can only hope that the grace consistently displayed by Senator Finestone will have rubbed off on the various wannabes. Otherwise, this may prove to be a very ugly and public contest.

Summer snacks let mom get out of the kitchen

By EILEEN GOLTZ
Special to The CJN

There comes a time in the summer when I say no more to kitchen duty.

I decided to go on strike and told my boys it was time for them to fend for themselves. Not wanting to actually cook when it's 90 degrees outside, they took my file of no-bake cookies and went to town.

The following recipes have been taste tested by nine 15-year-olds and five 12-year-olds.

CHEWY RASPBERRY BARS

35 to 40 vanilla wafers
½ cup sweetened coconut flakes
¼ cup caramel topping
½ cup seedless red raspberry jam or other flavor jam or preserves
confectioner's sugar for garnish

Line an 8-inch square baking pan with foil, letting the foil extend about 2 inches above pan on opposite sides. Grease or spray with nonstick cooking spray. Process 25 of the vanilla wafers in food processor (or crush in a sturdy plastic food bag) until reduced to fine crumbs (you should have 1½ cups). Add coconut and caramel topping to crumbs and process (or knead in bag) until crumbs are moistened. Press firmly over bottom of prepared pan. Place in freezer while proceeding.

Scrape jam into small bowl and stir until very smooth. Spread evenly over chilled crust. Top with remaining wafers, in 3 rows. Cover and refrigerate at least 1½ hours or until set. Remove from pan by foil to cutting board. Dust with confectioner's sugar. Cut between wafers into bars.

Note: To make low fat, use fat free caramel topping.

To remove jam from knife between cuts, dip knife into a tall container of hot water and wipe dry.

CHOCOLATE OATMEAL COOKIES

2 cups sugar
4 tbsp. cocoa powder
1 tsp. vanilla
½ cup milk
½ cup butter
¼ cup peanut butter
3 cups oats

In a saucepan bring the sugar, cocoa, vanilla, milk and butter to a boil and remove from heat. Add the peanut butter and oats; mix well. Drop by teaspoonfuls onto waxed paper. Let cool until set. Makes 2½ to 3 dozen cookies.

CRISPY PEANUT BARS

10 oz. peanut butter chips
½ cup butter or margarine
6½ cups crispy rice cereal
12 oz. semisweet chocolate chips
½ cup light corn syrup
½ cup chopped honey-roasted peanuts

Line a 13x9-inch baking pan with foil, letting foil extend about 2 inches above pan on narrow ends. Grease or coat foil with nonstick cooking spray. Melt peanut butter chips and butter in a large bowl in microwave or in a heavy saucepan over low heat, stirring often, until thoroughly blended and smooth. Remove from heat, add cereal and stir until evenly coated. Scrape into prepared pan, spread evenly, then cover with waxed paper.

Place another 13x9-inch pan or heavy book on top and press into an even, compact layer. Remove waxed paper. Place pan in freezer for 10 minutes or until cereal mixture is firm while proceeding.

Melt chocolate chips as directed on bag. Add corn syrup and stir until well blended. Spread chocolate evenly on cereal mixture, then sprinkle with nuts. Top with waxed paper and lightly press nuts into chocolate. Refrigerate 1 hour or until firm. Lift foil by ends onto cutting board. Cut into bars.

Planning tip:

These bars can be refrigerated for up to 2 weeks, or kept frozen up to 1 month in an airtight container with waxed paper between layers.

GRANOLA FIG BARS

20 fig bars
2½ cups granola with raisins
⅔ cup light corn syrup
2 tbsp. honey
¾ cup crispy or regular M&Ms

Line an 8-inch square baking pan with foil, letting foil extend about 2 inches above pan on opposite edges. Grease or coat foil with nonstick cooking spray. Arrange fig cookies in prepared pan, in 4 evenly spaced rows of 5 bars each. Press down on bars until bars touch each other.

Put granola in a medium bowl.

In a heavy saucepan, bring corn syrup to a boil over medium heat. Without stirring, boil vigorously 3 minutes or until tiny white bubbles start to form on surface. Remove from heat; stir in honey until blended. Pour over granola and stir until coated. Cool slightly, and then stir in M&Ms. (If too hot, M&Ms will melt; if too cool, they can't be stirred in.)

Scrape onto fig bars, spread evenly, then cover with greased waxed paper and gently press into an even, compact layer. Cover and refrigerate 1½ hours or until firm. Lift by foil ends onto cutting board. Cut into bars. To make lower fat, use fat-free fig bars and low fat granola.

MOCK BUTTERFINGER COOKIES

3 cups crushed corn flakes
1 cup crunchy peanut butter
½ cup sugar
½ cup white corn syrup
6 oz. chocolate chips

In a saucepan heat the peanut butter, sugar and corn syrup over low heat until melted. Stir in cereal. Pat into an 8x8-inch lightly greased pan. Melt the chocolate chips in the microwave and spread them over the top. Cool and cut into 12 pieces.

THIN MINT CRACKERS

1 lb. dark coating chocolate
80 (or so) round butter crackers few drops of peppermint flavoring

Melt the chocolate coatings in the microwave or in a double boiler. After it is melted, stir a couple of drops of peppermint flavor into the chocolate. Dip crackers into the melted chocolate and then place onto a cold cookie sheet and put into the refrigerator to set. (A freezing tray to rest the dipped cookies will keep the bottoms neat-looking.) In a few minutes take them out and package in candy cups. The cookies are best kept at room temperature or in a cool dry place away from any odors. Makes 80 cookies.

Healthy watermelon can be served in different ways

By EILEEN GOLTZ

The watermelon is a guiltless food. It's about 95 percent water and it's also good for you, since it contains vitamins A and C.

Most of us have only had the pleasure of eating watermelon just as nature intended it: cold, and right out of the rind. But this summer, after purchasing mass quantities of my favorite melon, I figured I'd better find some recipes that let me incorporate it into my menus.

The following recipes are the happy results of my search.

WATERMELON POPSICLES

Popsicle molds are sold at some drugstores and department stores.

2½ cups seeded diced watermelon
½ cup fresh raspberries or frozen unsweetened, thawed
6 tbsp. sugar
1 tbsp. plus 2 tsp. fresh lemon juice
1 tbsp. crème de cassis (black currant-flavored liqueur) or light corn syrup

Combine all ingredients in blender; puree until smooth. Strain into 2-cup glass measuring cup, pressing on solids to extract as much liquid as possible. Pour puree into popsicle molds, dividing equally. Freeze overnight. (Can be prepared 1 week ahead. Keep frozen.) Makes about eight ¼-cup popsicles.

WATERMELON, CANTALOUPE AND RED PEPPER SALSA

a 1-lb. piece of watermelon a 1-lb. piece of cantaloupe
½ red bell pepper
½ small sweet onion such as Vidalia
⅓ cup packed fresh cilantro sprigs
½ fresh jalapeño chili
2 tbsp. chopped fresh mint leaves
1 tbsp. fresh lime juice

Remove rinds and seeds from melons and cut fruit into ¼-inch pieces. Cut bell pepper into ¼-inch pieces. Finely chop onion and cilantro and, wearing rubber gloves, finely chop jalapeño with seeds. In a bowl toss together all ingredients and season with salt. Salsa may be made 4 hours ahead and chilled, covered. Makes about 4 cups.

WATERMELON GAZPACHO

6 cups cubed seeded watermelon
1½ cups chopped golden delicious apples
½ cup finely chopped onion
½ cup finely chopped green pepper
1 tbsp. dried basil
½ tbsp. salt
¼ tbsp. coarsely ground pepper
¼ tbsp. chili powder
1 tbsp. cider vinegar

In blender, puree watermelon; pour into large mixing bowl. Stir in remaining ingredients. Refrigerate, covered, at least one hour to blend flavors.

FLORIDA WATERMELON SALSA

3 cups watermelon, diced medium
½ cup red onion, diced small
½ cup sweet red pepper, diced medium
½ cup tomato, diced medium
1 tsp. jalapeño pepper, minced
1 tbsp. garlic, minced
2 tbsp. fresh cilantro, chopped
1 tbsp. fresh basil, chopped
1 tbsp. fresh parsley, chopped
1½ tbsp. balsamic vinegar
¼ cup olive oil
salt and pepper to taste

In a bowl combine all ingredients, toss gently and refrigerate for 2 hours. Serve cold or slightly warm with your favorite fish or chicken. Makes 4-6 servings.

WATERMELON - BASIL VINAIGRETTE

4 cups fresh watermelon, chopped and drained
¼ cup red onion, diced small
2 tbsp. honey
¼ cup white wine vinegar
¼ cup oil
2 tbsp. fresh basil chopped
1 tbsp. fresh parsley, chopped
salt and pepper to taste

Combine all ingredients in blender or food processor and blend for approximately 30 seconds. Drizzle over mixed salad greens and garnish with sliced watermelon. Makes approximately 2 cups.

JCC rampage suspect wanted 'America to kill Jews'

By TOM TUGEND
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

LOS ANGELES — When Buford O'Neal Furrow walked into the North Valley Jewish Community Centre and opened fire last week, he reportedly wanted his action to serve as "a wake-up call to America to kill Jews."

A source said the white supremacist, suspected in a shooting spree at the North Valley Jewish Community Centre that injured five, made the comment as he turned himself in to FBI authorities in Las Vegas on Wednesday, 24 hours after the assault.

The gunman's attack at the centre in the San Fernando Valley community of Granada Hills sent shock waves and demands for tighter security throughout the Jewish community, still tense from arson attacks on three Sacramento, Calif., synagogues on June 18.

Carli Morgenstern, 17, was one of three counsellors watching over 14 children in kindergarten and Grade 1. Morgenstern said she heard the gunshots and then saw the wounded counsellor run into the room, blood dripping down her leg. The other counsellors frantically gathered the kids together and ran to the centre's parking lot and then across the street before heading for the convalescent home next door.

Morgenstern said the centre had held no fire drills and that the counsellors had not received any training in how to handle an emergency.

"I never thought about security or that we didn't have a security guard," she said later. "It never bothered me. This is such a friendly place; everybody knows everybody else."

Responding to security fears, the United Jewish Communities and the Anti-Defamation League (ADL) formed an alliance after the shootings to work with Jewish community relations councils to spread security awareness, especially as the High Holy Days and the Jewish school year near. In the coming weeks, the groups will open a security hotline and will post the ADL's security handbook on the Internet.

Manuals for emergency planning and crisis management are regularly provided to staff at Jewish Community Centres Association (JCCA) affiliates.

In a news release, the JCCA advised all of its affiliates to contact their local law enforcement agencies and to take appropriate precautions. The statement commended "the calm, concerned manner" with which Jewish community centres across the continent "dealt with the situation." It also commended the Los Angeles staff at the centre and the Los Angeles police and fire departments "for their swift and courageous response to this difficult event."

Most seriously injured was a 5-year old boy, not yet identified, who was shot twice, one bullet piercing his abdomen, the other his foot. After undergoing six hours of surgery, the boy, who doctors described as "a real fighter," was in serious but stable condition.

Lesser injuries were sustained by Isabelle Shalometh, 68, the centre's receptionist; Mindy Finkelstein, 16, a camp counsellor; and Joshua Stepakoff, 6.

Another injured 6-year old boy was not identified at his parents' request.

Authorities said they filed a warrant charging Furrow, 37, with five state counts of attempted murder and that he will be extradited to Los Angeles after an arraignment. Federal civil rights charges may also be brought.

Police and media reports say Furrow has had a history of mental problems, criminal assaults and has been affiliated with various racist and anti-Semitic groups.

The Seattle Times reported that Furrow was also a member of the white supremacist Aryan Nations.

The Los Angeles-based Simon Wiesenthal Centre said that a munitions-laden van, apparently abandoned by Furrow after the shooting, contained a book written by Richard Kelly Hoskins, a former member of the American Nazi Party and an adherent of the anti-Semitic Christian Identity movement.

"Hoskins believes that Jews are a satanic threat to civilization and that 'people of color' are subhuman," said Rabbi Marvin Hier, dean of the Wiesenthal Centre.

Rabbi Abraham Cooper, associate dean of the Simon Wiesenthal Centre, told CNN that Furrow had visited the centre's Museum of Tolerance recently and was thrown out for "abnormal" behavior.

Furrow is a resident of Olympia, Wash., and reportedly once lived with Debbie Mathews, widow of Robert Mathews, founder of the hate group called The Order. Mathews was killed in 1984 when his hideout caught fire during a shootout with federal agents.

Some 22 Order members were accused of numerous crimes, among them the 1984 murder of Alan Berg, a Jewish talk-show host in Denver.

Thom Mrozek, a spokesman for the U.S. attorney's office in Los Angeles, told the Associated Press that federal prosecutors would also charge Furrow in the slaying of Joseph Ileto, 39, a postal worker killed in Los Angeles about an hour after the JCC shootings.

Ileto was found dead in his driveway. He had just delivered mail to a home and was returning to his truck when he was shot several times, Mrozek said.

The incident has also prompted renewed calls for stricter gun control laws.

Although few believe sweeping changes can be enacted, even in the wake of the string of assaults across the country, some U.S. lawmakers and gun control advocates say it is time for Congress to act on pending legislation that would impose some restrictions on gun sales.

The Senate has already passed a juvenile justice bill that would subject individuals purchasing guns at gun shows to background checks, ban the import of magazines with a capacity of more than 10 rounds, and require that trigger locks or other safety devices be sold with handguns.

But the House of Representatives, following a fierce lobbying effort by the National Rifle Association, rejected those proposals in June.

In the wake the centre's shooting, some Jewish activists are taking lawmakers to task.

"Congress' inaction has left loopholes in our gun control laws, but more importantly it has fostered the culture of violence that spawns tragic and potentially tragic events every week," said Rabbi David Saperstein, director of the Religious Action Centre of Reform Judaism.

Meanwhile, the North Valley JCC, which normally welcomes 200-300 youngsters daily, vowed to carry on. Activities were transferred to a nearby church Wednesday, and will be returned to the centre as soon as the police allow.

U.S. pushing for quick implementation of Wye

By ALUF BENN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM – U.S. President Bill Clinton is pushing for a quick implementation of the Wye agreement, according to a letter he sent Prime Minister Ehud Barak over the weekend.

The presidential message, following a phone conversation between the two leaders, added to a flurry of U.S. pressure on Israel, including meetings conducted by Justice Minister Yossi Beilin in Washington last week with national security adviser Sandy Berger and Secretary of State Madeleine Albright.

During the session, the Jerusalem envoy was told by the Washington power brokers that a quick withdrawal – and release of security prisoners – is essential to rebuild Palestinian confidence in the peace process.

The U.S. diplomatic messages concede that they know Barak wants to move the process forward, but they express doubts that his plan to turn the third withdrawal into part of the final status deal will win Palestinian support.

Barak, meanwhile, has ordered the army to prepare for a Wye withdrawal commencing on Sept. 1, with the first troop movements scheduled for Oct. 1.

The first top-level U.S. official to visit Israel since the elections will be the chair of the joint chiefs of staff Gen. Henry Shelton, who is due here for meetings with Barak and top IDF officials.

Meanwhile, Israeli and Palestinian negotiators were at the Erez junction to thrash out the details of a compromise plan for a final Israeli withdrawal, according to Wye, in February 2000.

The Palestinians are still unhappy about the delay and Israel is trying to sweeten the deal by offering releases of security prisoners and by giving the go ahead to start construction of the Palestinian port in Gaza.

Clinton's letter was not mentioned by Barak at the cabinet session yesterday. The Prime Minister's Office confirmed that Clinton sent a letter to Barak, but it did not contain any element of "pressure" on Israel.

Barak told ministers yesterday that he expects an agreement with the Palestinians over the next 10 days. He said the talks with the Palestinians include an agreed upon postponement of the third stage of the second withdrawal, while other aspects of the agreement would be advanced.

Deputy Defence Minister Ephraim Sneh met with chief of Palestinian security Muhammad Dahlan, telling him: "We aren't going to cheat you... Barak is a man who keeps his word, and if you insist, he'll implement Wye. But his offer guarantees that the agreement will be even better.

Exploring peace with Syria

By ALUF BENN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The United States believes the proposals raised by the late prime minister Yitzhak Rabin in his negotiations with Syria should not be ignored, Secretary of State Madeleine Albright told Justice Minister Yossi Beilin in a meeting in Washington last Friday.

Sources say Albright commented that Rabin's proposals were still valid and must be addressed in the effort to renew the Israeli-Syrian dialogue.

Beilin reported to Prime Minister Ehud Barak on his meeting with Albright.

As a condition for renewing talks, Syria is demanding that Israel respect Rabin's "commitment" to a full withdrawal from the Golan Heights to the borders of June 4, 1967. In the past, the Syrians have asked the United States to base the renewal of talks on their interpretation of the negotiations during Rabin's term. The United States has refused the Syrian request.

American sources had previously told Ha'aretz that Albright's predecessor, Warren Christopher, passed a message in July 1994 from Rabin to Syrian President Hafez al-Assad promising withdrawal to the June 4 lines "if Israeli demands for security arrangements and normalization are met."

The same sources emphasized that Rabin's offer was not a "commitment" but rather a "basis for negotiations." In her meeting with Beilin, Albright used a less vague term, but not the word "commitment."

Israeli officials are interpreting Albright's remarks as a signal that the United States is likely to support the Syrian position regarding the starting point for new talks with Israel.

Beilin holds that Rabin's proposal was not an agreement and is not binding on the current government. He believes there is no point in discussing a withdrawal to the June 4 line, which is not a legitimate border. If that is the Syrian demand, then Assad does not really want peace with Israel, Beilin said.

The Week in Israel

Aug. 9

• Israel launched air strikes against Hezbollah targets in southern Lebanon. The sorties, which followed five other strikes in 24 hours, came in the wake of Hezbollah attacks on Israeli positions in the region. Israel has launched more than 100 such attacks this year.

Aug. 10

• Israel government offices and state-owned utilities are behind schedule in preparing for the Y2K computer bug, according to the state comptroller. The comptroller urged authorities to take the so-called millennium bug more seriously.

• Prime Minister Ehud Barak said Islamic officials violated the law when they widened an opening in a wall of Jerusalem's Temple Mount compound earlier in the week. Barak praised the response of the police, who before dawn, sealed off a door-sized opening excavated at the Al-Aksa Mosque.

Aug. 11

• Security officials sealed the West Bank after a Jew was wounded in a shooting attack near Jenin. The shooting incident came after a Palestinian twice drove his car into a group of Israeli soldiers, wounding 12. The Palestinian was shot and killed.

Aug. 12

• Syria rejected an Israeli call by Foreign Minister David Levy for direct talks. Meanwhile, a Syrian diplomat participated in an open academic meeting attended, for the first time, by Israeli researchers.

• Education Minister Yossi Sarid offered counselling help to the victims of this week's shootings at the JCC near Los Angeles. The ministry has decades of experience in helping victims of terror.

Aug. 13

• Speaking at the 26th graduation ceremony of the National Security College, Barak urged Syrian President Hafez al-Assad to seize a "historic opportunity" to make peace with Israel.

Moscow chief rabbi slams Russian authorities

By JULIA GOLDMAN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — Russia is not "responding adequately to political and violent anti-Semitism," said the chief rabbi of Moscow.

Noting a recent spate of anti-Semitic acts, including the July 12 knifing of a prominent member of the Moscow Jewish community, Rabbi Pinchas Goldschmidt told a recent gathering of American Jewish leaders here that neither the Moscow city government nor the country's federal government is fulfilling its promises to provide security for Jewish sites in Russia.

At a news conference at Anti-Defamation League headquarters in New York, Rabbi Goldschmidt also formally announced the creation of a joint institute to monitor anti-Semitism in Russia.

The Russian Jewish Congress, an umbrella organization, will work together with the ADL, the National Conference on Soviet Jewry and other groups to study Russian public attitudes toward Jews.

A poll of these attitudes is already under way, according to the national director of the ADL, Abraham Foxman. He said the American and Russian groups will work "jointly to determine the best steps to expose" the extent of Russian anti-Semitism and will produce educational publications to distribute to the Russian public.

Rabbi Goldschmidt said Russian Jews "are apprehensive, and some people are worried about who is standing behind" the recent attacks, explaining that the government's inaction is breeding suspicion that it may not want to find the perpetrators.

Three bombings that occurred in Russia during the past four months remain unsolved. The attacker in the July 12 incident was apprehended by private security officers hired by the Jewish community, Rabbi Goldschmidt said.

"Without the provision of local Jewish business people providing their own security," he said, most Jewish property would be "not secured at all."

Contrasting the recent attacks in Russia to the shootings at a Jewish community centre near Los Angeles, Rabbi Goldschmidt pointed out that American political figures and law enforcement officials responded "right away."

During a visit to Washington last month, then-prime minister Sergei Stepashin met with the heads of American Jewish organizations and vowed to "eradicate" anti-Semitism.

In introducing Rabbi Goldschmidt, Ronald Lauder, chair of the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations, said that what Russian leaders "say here and what they say in Russia are two different things. What they say in Russia is – they don't say anything" about anti-Semitism.

Stepashin was fired suddenly last week and replaced by a former internal security chief, Vladimir Putin.

Rabbi Goldschmidt expressed hope that the new Cabinet appointed by President Boris Yeltsin would implement a crackdown on anti-Semitism as one of its first priorities.

"There is not enough local pressure or national pressure," he said, adding that "the Jewish community is only coming into being now" in Russia.

He said he was looking forward to a visit from American Jewish leaders to lend support to the cause.

Asked if the recent change in government gave him any reason to be hopeful that the Russian government would put more emphasis on Jewish security, Rabbi Goldschmidt said, "As Jews, we always have to be optimistic."

Government shake-up concerns Russian Jews

By LEV KRICHEVSKY
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

MOSCOW — Russian President Boris Yeltsin's latest cabinet reshuffling could hinder the government's ability to crack down on anti-Semitism, according to Russian Jewish leaders.

"There is little grounds for optimism when we call on the government to ensure stability but there is no stability with the government itself," said Pavel Feldblum, the executive vice-president of the Moscow Jewish Community.

Feldblum's comments came after Yeltsin sacked his entire cabinet, including Prime Minister Sergei Stepashin, in a surprise move last week. Yeltsin replaced Stepashin, the fourth prime minister he has fired in the last 17 months, with security chief Vladimir Putin, a former KGB spy.

During a trip to Washington last month, Stepashin condemned anti-Semitism in Russia and vowed to "eradicate" it.

Last week's news took leading politicians, experts and ordinary Russians by surprise. Last week, Moscow's leading newspapers speculated about an impending cabinet reshuffle, but few expected the change would come so soon.

Like Stepashin, Putin, 47, is a native of St. Petersburg. A former aide to St. Petersburg's liberal former mayor, Anatoly Sobchak, Putin has enjoyed a meteoric rise in the Kremlin.

Recently he has been the director of the Federal Security Service (FSS), the Russian domestic intelligence agency that is the successor to the Soviet-era KGB, as well as the secretary of Yeltsin's Security Council.

Putin, who has a reputation for being loyal and cautious, said he planned to retain key ministers from the outgoing government in his new cabinet. He also vowed his administration would continue the Kremlin's current policies, including a commitment to economic reforms.

In his previous jobs, Putin became familiar with some of the issues that concern Russia's Jewish community. As the former head of the FSS, and in his work on the Security Council and on a presidential commission to combat extremism, Putin dealt with the issues of anti-Semitism, neo-Nazism and racism in Russian society. But Putin has never made any direct public comments about anti-Semitism.

Putin has had several meetings with Jewish officials, according to Moscow's chief rabbi, Pinchas Goldschmidt. Last year Rabbi Goldschmidt was among a group of Jewish leaders who met with Putin, then head of the FSS, to discuss security-related issues.

Putin was "sympathetic" to issues raised by the Jewish leaders in the meeting, said Mark Levin, executive director of the Washington-based National Conference on Soviet Jewry, who participated in the meeting.

But Levin and the Union of Council for Soviet Jews, another U.S.-based advocacy group for Jews in the former Soviet Union, expressed caution over the appointment.

As with most previous reshuffling, the reason for Yeltsin's latest decision remains unclear.

In a televised address to the nation, Yeltsin said he would like to see Putin as Russia's next president.

But according to a new poll, Putin enjoys little popularity among Russia's electorate. Ninety-two percent of 3,049 callers to a poll conducted last week by the Echo Moskvy radio station said they would not cast their votes for him if he ran for president.

The Duma, Russia's lower house of parliament, is expected to approve Putin's appointment.

German Jewish leader Bubis buried in Tel Aviv

By TOBY AXELROD
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

BERLIN — A man who witnessed the near destruction of German Jewry in the Holocaust, but survived to help preside over its renaissance, died last week at the age of 72.

In keeping with his wishes, Ignatz Bubis, the outspoken and respected leader of Germany's Jewish community, was buried Sunday in Tel Aviv.

That he chose to be buried in Israel rather than in Germany, illustrates a failure he said he felt toward the end of his life – the failure to convince his fellow Germans that they cannot escape their past, but that they bear a unique responsibility to be a light unto other nations in remembering and preventing another Holocaust.

Bubis' death came weeks after he said he would rather be buried in Israel than in Germany because he feared that his grave would be desecrated like that of his predecessor, Heinz Galinski.

On Sunday, his request was fulfilled in the Kiryat Shaul cemetery in Tel Aviv, where German President Johannes Rau and Israeli President Ezer Weizman led some 200 mourners at his funeral.

The Central Council of Jews in Germany reported that Bubis died at a hospital in his home city of Frankfurt. The exact cause of death was not given, but Bubis had suffered a series of illnesses in recent months. He is survived by his wife, Ida, and their daughter, Naomi Ann.

Across the nation, Bubis was mourned as a man who brought his own experience as a Holocaust survivor to bear on behalf of all minority groups in Germany.

In Berlin, the public was invited to write words of condolence in a book in the Jewish community centre. Flowers were placed there and at another Jewish centre.

Because he survived the Holocaust, part of Bubis' job was to warn his fellow Germans not to stray down the path of intolerance again. But he was also one of those eyewitnesses whose jobs have been increasingly replaced by memorial stones and museums.

Germans are marking with fanfare their metamorphosis into a phase when they're not branded by the crimes of their elders. They want to be considered a normal nation, even using the term Never Again Auschwitz as a slogan behind which their soldiers joined the NATO forces in Kosovo.

When Bubis believed his fellow citizens had failed to learn from their tragic history, he blamed himself.

"I am ashamed for you," he said from a podium in Berlin, when neo-Nazis threw stones and tomatoes at Germans demonstrating against racism in 1992.

"All decent Germans carry his message in their hearts," wrote the journalist Volker Mueller.

Jewish leaders in Germany and abroad and German politicians from across the political spectrum – some of whom had verbally sparred with Bubis – mourned his death.

Bubis was known for being outspoken when he believed his fellow citizens needed to be criticized. Last year, he took German writer Martin Walser – expressing an opinion held by many postwar Germans – to task for saying it was time to stop using the term Auschwitz as a whip against Germany.

Be it in favor of the integration of new citizens, or against right-wing extremism, Bubis let his opinion be known.

Bubis said he supported a Holocaust memorial in Berlin, but not at the expense of protecting the memorials at concentration camp sites. Germany's culture minister, Michael Naumann, recently promised to nearly double the funding available to such memorials.

Bubis, who was born in 1927 in Breslau – now Wroclaw, Poland, but then a part of Germany – lost his father and two siblings in the Holocaust. He was liberated from a labor camp in 1945 by the Russian army and called his survival an accident. He later settled in Frankfurt, where he became a successful, if sometimes controversial, real estate investor.

Customers bid farewell to Shoppers' Rae Frank

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — After 50 years working in the same drug store at Bathurst and Glencairn, Rae Frank, 74, has retired.

Customers, many of them close friends, gathered recently to say goodbye to the sprightly woman who always gave helpful advice with a smile.

"I'll just take it easy for a few weeks and then decide what to do with my spare time, probably volunteering of some kind," she said.

For 24 years, Frank worked side by side with her late husband, Harry, in running Northways Pharmacy, and then stayed on for 24 more years at Shoppers, in the same location.

"I had good days and bad days, just like everybody else."

In the past few months she had slowed down, and was working for Norman Stern, the franchise owner, from 8 a.m. to 1 p.m., helping in the dispensary.

In the early days at Northways, she was working 100 hours a week, seven days a week, and raising three children besides.

"In those days, mothers didn't go to work as much and my children resented the time I spent away from them. But now that they are parents they understand," she said.

The children helped out in the store whenever they were needed, despite their resentment, Frank said.

In 1972, the Franks tried living in Israel for six months with the intention of making aliyah.

"It would have been a different life for us, but as it turned out Murray Koffler offered Harry and me a chance to work at Shoppers and we came back to Canada."

But the Franks never lost touch with their many friends in Israel, making at least 30 trips there over the years.

Rae Frank

One of the reasons for their frequent trips was to see their daughter, Pam Ahlfeld and her family, who lived in Israel for 10 years and now live in Toronto.

Frank's other two children are Dr. Sheldon Frank, a specialist in gynecology and obstetrics in Kitchener, and Elana Frank Simpson, a Toronto film producer. She has seven grandchildren, ranging in age from 12 to 25.

Even after he graduated in medicine, Sheldon delivered prescriptions for his father's pharmacy if the need arose.

Rae and Harry Frank were married in 1943 while Harry was in the armed services . Rae continued working to help her husband go through pharmacy college after he was discharged.

"Pharmacy has changed a lot in 50 years," she said. " It is now much more automated, which is easier on the customer. And there are so many new medicines. People are living longer and more healthful lives."

She is grateful that her long career enabled her to make so many friends.

Since she lives close to the store, Frank will continue to be a familiar figure in the area.

Ben and Hilda Katz honored as Baycrest Man/Woman of the year

TORONTO — A couple who immigrated from Poland in the early '20s were honored recently by Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care as Man and Woman of the Year.

At the ceremony in June, the Katzes announced another endowment to Baycrest, the Ben and Hilda chair in gerontological nursing.

"Ben and Hilda Katz are not only great benefactors for Baycrest, but are visionaries who saw the potential of this centre to become a world leader in geriatric care and helped to make it happen," said Marvin Sadowski, chair of Baycrest's board of directors.

The Katzes' association with Baycrest began more than 30 years ago when Hilda's mother Rose Shanfield moved to the Jewish Home for the Aged. The couple was so impressed with the excellent care Shanfield received that they decided to support Baycrest.

In the early '80s, the Katzes gave a significant donation toward the building of Baycrest's hospital, which bears their name. The gift inspired many in the community to give contributions to the hospital.

"Ben and Hilda Katz are the heart and soul of Baycrest," said Sam Ruth, executive vice-president of Baycrest until 1980.

In addition to these two donations, the Katzes have also supported the transportation fund; the scholars endowment fund; the Centre for Gerontological Social Work at Baycrest and University of Toronto (the first centre of its kind in Canada) and lots more.

TV show on A Quest for Meaning

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Where would one see a haredi Jew and a homosexual rabbi in the same context – and maybe earn a university credit in the process?

The answer: On Vision TV.

Judaism – A Quest for Meaning is a 12-part series with Toronto educator and writer Elliott Malamet. The basis for a University of Waterloo distance education course, it will run on Wednesdays from 8:30 to 9:00 p.m., beginning Sept. 1.

The show will also appear on the Odyssey Channel in the United States, and eventually on TVOntario and City TV. It was produced in association with all four stations.

The series came to be after Sleeping Giant Productions, a Toronto company whose motto is "television that matters," approached the university last year about doing a series on Judaism, with the idea of turning it into a distance education course.

Waterloo offers about 200 such courses, including two with Judaic content, to students across Canada.

Prof. Paul Socken, chair of the dean's advisory committee on Jewish studies (and chair of Waterloo's department of French studies), liked the idea, provided it was "theme-based – like what an ancient faith like Judaism has to offer a modern society."

Socken's role, he said, was that of "shadchan" between Sleeping Giant and Malamet. Socken also hired Malamet as an adjunct professor to develop and teach the course, called The Quest for Meaning in Modern Judaism.

A scene from one of the episodes of Judaism-A Quest for Meaning.

"The reason I thought of Elliott," said Socken, "is that he has the perfect synthesis of being able to speak to ordinary people and to keep the academic level very high."

Malamet, 39, has a PhD in English literature, and teaches rabbinics and Jewish ethics at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT). He has also taught at the University of Toronto and Queen's University.

A CJN columnist, he has written as well for the National Post and has appeared as a guest on CBC television and radio.

Every week he leads an interactive educational adult service at Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue, drawing on an eclectic variety of sources.

"A lot… that emerged on the television series is stuff we talked about at Pray and Learn," Malamet said.

Although he hadn't considered doing such a project himself, Malamet thought it was the type of thing that should be done. The offer to participate was "absolutely fate-ridden," he said.

The series was filmed in Toronto, New York, Boston and Israel. Among those featured are author/lawyer Alan Dershowitz, feminist author Letty Cottin Pogrebin, educator Rachael Turkienicz, filmmaker Simcha Jacobovici and rabbis from every denomination.

"We tried to get as much diversity as possible," said Malamet.

"These people would never get together in real life," he noted. "That, I found fascinating."

A segment called Trouble in the Family, referring to disunity among the denominations of Judaism, is one of Malamet's favorites. "I think it's very important. Exciting, actually," he said.

The final episode, filmed at CHAT and the Toronto Heschel School, is also important, he said.

The videotapes are "almost a kind of teaser for the more substantive academic work" of the course, said Malamet.

To the best of Socken's knowledge, the project is precedent-setting.

"Although [Waterloo's Jewish studies program is] small and we're beginning, we're trying to do things that are innovative, exciting and topical, and that will give Waterloo a place in the constellation of Jewish Studies programs," he said.

Students enrolling in the course will have additional course work, assignments and a final exam.

CRITIC PICKS 50 GREATEST JEWISH FILMS

Kathryn Bernheimer, a critic of Jewish films based in Denver, has accomplished an audacious and entertaining deed in her recent book, The 50 Greatest Jewish Movies: A Critic's Ranking of the Very Best (Birch Lane Press).

In the process of listing her choices, she pays thoughtful homage to a vast and growing body of cinematic work that extends back to early film classics such as The Golem (silent, 1920), The Jazz Singer (the first talkie, 1927) and The Great Dictator (1936), and right up to such contemporary gems as Schindler's List (1993) and Shine (1996).

Woody Allen is well represented with Annie Hall (1977), which Bernheimer calls "the most beloved Jewish romantic comedy of all time," Broadway Danny Rose (1984) in which Allen plays one of his "most sympathetic and thoroughly Jewish characters," and Crimes and Misdemeanors (1989), rightly extolled as "a complex morality tale that ranks as the cinema's most rigorous exploration of Jewish values and ethics."

Paul Mazursky is another of Bernheimer's favorite directors, weighing in with Down and Out in Beverly Hills ("a comic Jewish success story," 1986) and Enemies, A Love Story, a deft 1989 treatment of I. B. Singer's novel of Holocaust survivors coping in America. Director Joan Macklin Silver directed two strong contenders, Hester Street (1974) and Crossing Delancey (1988), but only the latter made it into the top 50; Hester Street, however, is given due homage.

Bernheimer's number 1 film is The Chosen (1981), "one of the most profoundly Jewish films ever made." Following close behind is Fiddler on the Roof (1971). Besides titles already mentioned, the top 10 list includes Shoah (1985), Funny Girl (1968), Gentleman's Agreement (1947), Exodus (1960) and the two biblical epics Ben-Hur (1959) and The Ten Commandments (1956), which share the number 10 spot.

Canada is represented with Ted Kotcheff's treatment of the Mordecai Richler novel The Apprenticeship of Duddy Kravitz (1974) and the cinematic rendering of Morley Torgov's novel The Outside Chance of Maximilian Glick (1988), which Bernheimer calls "an utterly charming coming-of-age comedy." Honorable mention is given to The Quarrel, another Canadian entry which Bernheimer admits did not receive its due critical acclaim.

As expected, Bernheimer's list includes The Pawnbroker, The Diary of Anne Frank, Goodbye Columbus, Cabaret, Biloxi Blues and Yentl. I heartily endorse her inclusion of Driving Miss Daisy (1989) and the 1988 documentary Almonds and Raisins: A History of the Yiddish Cinema – chosen as a stand-in for the many Yiddish classics produced between 1927 and 1939.

Old standards on the list include Body and Soul (1947), The Last Angry Man (1959), A Majority of One (1962), The Young Lions (1957) and Marjorie Morningstar (1958).

More questionable, perhaps, is the inclusion of the Mel Brooks comedy Blazing Saddles (1974), the gangster film Bugsy (1991), the von Bulow murder story of Reversal of Fortune (1990), the traumatic thriller Marathon Man (1976), the syrupy Dickens-based musical Oliver! (1968) and the "highly commercial, superficial yet appealing" Dirty Dancing (1987).

Foreign films on the list include Au Revoir Les Enfants (France, 1987), The Revolt of Job (Hungary, 1987), Madame Rosa (1977) and Europa Europa (Germany, 1991).

In an afterword, Bernheimer attempts to explain the exclusion of such films as Sophie's Choice, The Garden of the Finzi-Continis, The Shop on Main Street, The Frisco Kid, The Sunshine Boys and Crossfire. Ultimately, she acknowledges there just wasn't enough space.

Paikin's visit to Kirkland Lake is a bitter-sweet portrait

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

At one time, six out of 10 stores in Kirkland Lake's business district were Jewish-owned. Today, as in other small Ontario towns, the Jewish community has dwindled to the point of no return.

On Aug. 23, Steve Paikin of TV-Ontario's Studio 2 visits Kirkland Lake and meditates on its Jewish past, present and future.

Appropriately enough, his documentary focuses on the cemetery, perhaps the most concrete manifestation of a once-vigorous Jewish presence in this northern Ontario settlement.

The original settlers, we're told, came to Kirkland Lake to mine economic opportunities. Some were merchants. Still others were farmers. But it was essentially a transient community.

One settler, Hyman Kaplan, settled in a town called Swastika, which still exists, and then moved on to Kirkland Lake.

Eddie Duke, Paikin's 78-year-old guide, recalls some of the old characters. One of them, Roza Brown, who died in 1947 at 94, was a gold prospector who had been a laundry worker in Cobalt.

In its heyday, Kirkland Lake's Jewish community was something of a hub. Duke recalls that parties and festivities attracted Jews from neighboring towns like Timmins and Noranda.

By the 1970s, the community had decreased significantly. The synagogue, built in 1927, was sold in 1971 because a minyan couldn't be raised.

And now, as Duke accompanies Paikin through the cemetery, he laments that no one may be left to say kaddish for him.

A bitter-sweet portrait of Jewish smalltown Ontario.

Fleischer Museum boasts collection of impressionism

By SHEILA DROPKIN
Special to The CJN

SCOTTSDALE — Before the first week of our holiday in the Phoenix/Scottsdale region of Arizona was over, my husband and I had visited all the major private art galleries, the fabulous new Scottsdale Museum of Contemporary Art (which had opened the day of our arrival) and the exhibition of artifacts from ancient Egypt in the Phoenix Art Museum. And so we were wondering where to go next.

In addition to all the scenic wonders of the mountains and desert, this part of the United States is ideal for providing an art fix, even when you can't afford to purchase anything.

To our delight, we were referred to the Fleischer Museum in north Scottsdale, as far away as one can get from the art scene and still be in the same city. Opened in 1990 as the first museum dedicated to American Impressionism, California School, the Fleischer is a unique example of the blend of art and business.

The museum, open daily except holidays, is the focal point of the corporate headquarters of Franchise Finance Corporation of America (FFCA) and admission is free. The day we visited, we shared the space with about 20 elementary school students, their teacher and a docent.

The Fleischer includes a two-story exhibition space and a sky-lit sculpture court, occupying 15,000 of the 60,000 square feet available inside the dramatic building, which is a work of art unto itself.

Constructed of red sandstone and other materials native to Arizona, including granite and copper, the $8.5 million (US) structure is the brainchild of Morton Fleischer, FFCA founder and president, and his wife Donna, who serves as curator of the museum.

The drama and beauty of the museum is contrasted sharply with what appeared to be the rather pedestrian offices of the corporation's 75 employees, which can be glimpsed through the windows of the sculpture court.

I did note, though, that the offices had art on the walls and read subsequently that all the office furniture is top of the line. Employees also enjoy a fully equipped health club, an aerobics centre and a racquetball court.

Located on 260 acres of vast expanse, against the scenic backdrop of the McDowell Mountains and the Sonoran Desert, the building boasts a sense of western grandeur and majesty.

Completing the atmosphere is the dramatic 15-foot bronze sculpture by artist Buck McCain which is located at the building's entrance. Called Spirit, it features five life-size frolicking horses.

The museum's permanent collection was based on the Fleischers' personal acquisition of more than 150 California impressionism pieces.

After a 40-year period of anonymity, there has been renewed interest in this school of art since the 1970s. The school was founded by artists who traveled and painted internationally and had settled in California at some point in their careers.

They came there for the climate, beauty of the diverse landscape and the availability of bright, sunny days. They enjoyed great success in the early years of this century until the advent of modernism in the 1930s.

The Fleischers began their collection in 1983 with the purchase of Mount Alice at Sunset, a dramatic oil painting by Franz Bischoff which hangs in a place of honor in the museum. They haven't looked back since and as the size and scope of the collection grew, Donna Fleischer left her own horticulture business to serve as its full time director.

Although some of the artists were native Californians, most came from elsewhere in the United States, Europe and even Canada. Among the paintings on exhibit were two by Canadians John Wesley Cotton and James Arthur Murrow.

Canadian-born William Clapp, who was raised in California and studied art in Paris in the early 1900s, is represented by a pointillist-style painting called Steep City Street, 1944. Pointillism relies on the effect of a multitude of dots of color which create a vibrant and radiant picture.

While the focus remains on American impressionism, the museum now also includes Russian and Soviet impressionism from the Cold War era, serving as a window to Russian life during the Soviet era. In fact, the receptionist told us that some of the paintings we were admiring were soon to be removed to make room for an upcoming exhibit of Russian works of art.

Spy deserves 'Righteous' honor

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

When I visited Yad Vashem in Jerusalem this year, I was struck by the sheer number of trees dedicated to Righteous Gentiles. They seemed to go on forever around the museum's grounds, each representing someone who rescued Jews from Germany and Nazi-occupied countries.

Yet at present there isn't one tree dedicated to British spy Frank Foley, who according to Foley, The Spy Who Saved 10,000 Jews by Michael Smith (Hodder & Stoughton), used his cover as a passport control officer in pre-war Berlin to hasten the emigration requirements of many German Jews.

Officially working for British intelligence in Weimar Germany, Foley was a passport control officer in the British Consulate.

"Anyone seeking a visa to come to Britain or anywhere in the Empire had to be vetted by the local passport control officer... to keep track of Bolsheviks and anarchists," Smith writes.

Following Hitler's rise to power in the early '30s, Foley became increasingly busy when Jews who saw Kristallnacht and other state-sanctioned pogroms as portents of the Holocaust started lining up outside the consulate.

Immediately sympathizing with their cause, in 1935, Foley cabled London that Britain must relax its immigration laws. "For the Jewish youth, the future holds out no prospects in Germany and the greater part will be forced to emigrate."

And though in the '30s, the Nazis encouraged Jews to emigrate, bureaucracy and catch-22s (both British and German) made emigration to Palestine virtually impossible.

The British allowed emigration to Palestine via a Capitalist Visa for which potential immigrants needed to show they had enough money to start a new life.

However, any money a potential emigrant collected was taxed by the Nazis at 25 percent. The rest of their marks were paid into a Sonderkonto, or blocked account, that would be transferred at a high rate of exchange to Palestine. Not until this amount was transferred would the Germans give an exit visa, and this often took many months.

The trouble was the British wanted to see the money before they issued an entry visa.

"It was a catch-22 situation. I could only get the money once I was in Palestine and the British couldn't give me an entry visa before I had the money in hand," Wolfgang Meyer-Michael, a German Jew wanting to leave, says in the book.

"[There was] a very charming man, a Captain Foley, who was very interested in my plans and quite obviously prepared to help."

Foley used his connections in the Passport Office to expedite the emigration of fleeing Jews as well as he could. In this instance, Foley suggested that Meyer-Michael obtain a promissory note from a relative in Holland, even if his relative didn't have the money.

"The whole thing was a ploy. Foley knew that as well as I. But ...within half an hour I had the [entry visa] in my hands."

The first half of the book is full of incidents where Foley interceded on behalf of fleeing Jews.

A young woman, 19, Jewish and a communist, wanted to join her boyfriend and baby's father in Rhodesia. Although she was granted an exit visa by the Gestapo, the Rhodesians would have turned her down because of her communist affiliations. Her friends suggested she see Foley.

Smith writes: "'How old is she?' Frank asked. Told that she was 19, he replied: 'She was in prison for two years. That means she must have been just 17 when she was a communist. It seems to me that at that age anyone is likely to commit a youthful folly. Tell her to come and see me tomorrow.'"

When she went the next day, Foley had a visa ready for her.

"Quite how many Jews Frank had saved from the impending Holocaust is impossible to tell," the author says. " But one of those best placed to know said that between 1933 and 1939, tens of thousands more people received visas than should have done under a strict interpretation of the rules."

Frank Foley in 1939

At the outbreak of war, Foley had to leave Germany.

The second half of the book deals mostly with Foley's involvement in wartime espionage. Foley was one of the chief interrogators of Rudolf Hess when he flew to Britain on a peace mission.

Some of these espionage stories are intriguing, although they have nothing to do with the main focus of the book, Foley's involvement in rescuing Jews from pre-war Germany.

But there are also a fair number of digressionary chapters. A history of the Nazis' rise to power and of Palestine and the Balfour Declaration isn't really necessary.

Still it is a worthy book and Foley is worthy of the title Righteous Among the Nations.

In a note at the end of the book, the author pleads Foley's case: "The German Jews who arrived in Palestine had done what they could, entering his name in the Golden Book of the Keren Kayemet, the Jewish National Fund, and planting a grove of trees [at Kibbutz Harel, outside Jerusalem]. But the most widely recognized honor accorded to those who helped the Jews has been denied Foley for what seem quite spurious reasons."

A spiritual journey of discovery

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Synagogues have played a central role in Jewish communal life and worship since the destruction of the Second Temple.

And if you haven't noticed, synagogue buildings are extraordinarily imaginative from an architectural point of view.

There are synagogues in Hungary, Germany and Canada shaped like Moorish temples.

There are mud synagogues in Morocco and Yemen.

There are wooden synagogues in Poland.

There are ultra-modern synagogues in the United States whose crystalline forms create a mountain of light.

And, of course, there are the ruins of ancient synagogues in Israel.

Samuel Gruber, director of the Jewish Heritage Research Center in Syracuse, New York, has been studying synagogues near and far for years now.

This is readily evident as you flip through the pages of his handsome coffee-table book, Synagogues (Metro Books).

The Suchowola Synagogue, built in the mid-1700s was a fine example of Poland's wooden synagogues.

This informative and lavishly illustrated 120-page volume graciously unfolds in nine chapters.

Gruber analyses the synagogue in terms of its form and function.

He explores synagogues in the ancient world, the Middle Ages and the Renaissance.

He highlights synagogues in Muslim countries and in India and East Asia.

He studies Reform synagogues, and synagogues which have been lovingly rebuilt.

And last but not least, he offers up a portfolio of synagogues in the United States, home to the world's largest Jewish community.

Leafing through Synagogues, I was especially struck by the magnificent interior of an Orthodox shul in Presov, Slovakia; by an ancient synagogue in Galilee; by Aleppo's now empty and silent synagogue; by Cochin's palm-fringed synagogue; by Budapest's Romanesque masterpiece; and by Frank Lloyd Wright's high-vaulted temple in Elkins Park, Pennsylvania.

Synagogues, in short, takes us on a spiritual journey of discovery.

Exhibition features over 35 artists

By MIRIAM CHINSKY
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Dialogue, at the John B. Aird Gallery, is an absorbing Montreal import presented by the Association of Jewish Artists. Held over until Sept. 25, it showcases some 40 works by over 35 artists in a variety of media and styles.

Produced by former Montrealer Gary Bercovitch, Susan Garfield-Shulman, and Sol Levinson, founder of the group, it features artists of note as well as aspiring newcomers.

Bercovitch, who co-ordinated the Toronto exhibition, sees the juried selection culled from "the cream" of a Montreal show held in May and also entitled Dialogue, as representative of the comprehensive spectrum within the Jewish community. He adds, however, that non-Jewish artists were invited to contribute to the exhibition, and the word Dialogue derives from the joint venture.

Subject matter offers wide appeal, ranging from city highrise to wooded landscape, from sensuous nude to Kabbalah concept.

When Love Beckons by Nicole Landy.

Artists include: Bercovitch, Blaukopf, Bloom Spunt, Brooks-Bercovitch, Caiserman-Roth RCA, Dietcher, Drewry, Evette, Garfield-Shulman, Goldfarb, Green, Grostern, Heimlich, Herman, Herscovitch, Horowitz, Khandijian, Landy, Lang-Browns, Letovsky, Levinson, Levy, Mendel, Papier, Rill, Rohrlich, Rubinfeld, Rubinoff, Silverstein, Tyshler, L. Vineberg, M. Vineberg, Whol, Wolf, Wolfstein-Joseph.

The exhibition is sponsored, in part, in recognition of MAZON CANADA, funding food services for those in need. "We like to give back to the community in general," Bercovitch notes.

The Association of Jewish Artists was formed one year ago in Montreal. "Bringing together Jewish identified artists, it looks to providing both a communal voice and fine exhibition venues," says Bercovitch. Current membership is 45 but he observes, "Based on the quality of work shown in Dialogue, we expect to recruit many more Ontario visual artists to the association.

He believes that Jewish artists throughout the province will want to identify with one another and be interested in mutual feedback.

For membership information contact artists@altavista.net or write The Association of Jewish Artists, 455 Broadview Ave., Toronto, Ont. M4K 2N3.

THREE CENTURY CLUB

Minn Sandler, 103, recently joined Helen Johns, minister of citizenhip, culture and recreation with responsibility for seniors and women, to launch the Three Century Club. As part of Ontario 2000, the province's program to commemorate the new millennium, the club honors Ontario residents whose lives span the 19th, 20th and 21st centuries. The launch took place at Baycrest Centre, where Sandler lives.

New densitometer at Baycrest helps to detect osteoporosis

TORONTO — A state-of-the-art bone densitometer has been added to the diagnostic imaging department at Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care, to more accurately detect osteoporosis in seniors and get them into treatment earlier.

The Hologics QDR 4500 SL bone densitometer is considered to be among the most advanced technologies available for measuring bone loss. Baycrest is only the second health care facility in Toronto to use it; the other is St. Joseph's Health Centre.

Unlike conventional densitometers, which measure bone mineral density in the hip and spine, the new technology does an additional side-view scan of the spine, providing a more accurate reading.

"The lateral scan can detect osteoporosis in difficult or early cases where a conventional study might miss it," says Wendy Lavine, director of diagnositic imaging at Baycrest. For example, osteo-arthritis, which is prevalent among the elderly, can falsely increase the bone mineral density measure in a conventional frontal reading of the spine.

The new technology also eliminates the need for elderly patients to shift their bodies into different positions for the measurement. Such shifting can compromise accurate readings. Instead they simply lie still on a flat bed and the densitometer conveniently moves around them.

The risk of osteoporosis-related injuries, especially hip fractures, is high among the elderly. Osteoporosis-related fractures cost Ontario's health system $394 million a year, according to the Osteoporosis Society of Canada.

A diagnosis of bone loss can alert doctors to those seniors at risk of osteoporotic bone injuries, and get them into a comprehensive treatment program that includes medication, diet and exercise to slow down or possibly reverse the degenerative disease. Such action will help seniors stay active and healthy longer, and reduce their risk of fractures.

"An important part of treatment is that doctors be able to measure the effectiveness of drug therapies and other interventions on a patient with osteoporosis over a period of time," says Dr. Terumi Izukawa, deputy head, department of medicine, at Baycrest Centre.

"Lateral densitometry will show with more accuracy if there has been an increase in bone density with a particular drug treatment, or if bone loss has at least slowed."

In addition to drug therapy to treat osteoporosis, Baycrest has partnered with two other Toronto hospitals and Public Health to run POWER – an innovative exercise, education and nutrition program for adults aged 55+ who are diagnosed with osteoporosis. POWER is supported by the Regional Geriatric Program of Metropolitan Toronto, and Procter and Gamble Inc.

Baycrest's bone densitometry service is available to adults aged 55+ with a referral from their doctor. It's part of Baycrest's overall osteoporosis treatment strategy, which includes the osteoporosis clinic, the POWER program, and the fitness and health promotion program.

Researchers fight against STSS

TORONTO — The deadly killer Streptococcal Toxic Shock Syndrome, commonly associated with flesh eating disease, has a new foe.

Researchers from the department of microbiology at Mount Sinai and Princess Margaret hospitals found that there was a 30 percent reduction in mortality rates for patients treated with a medication called intravenous immunoglobulin. Their findings were released April 1 in the journal Clinical Infectious Diseases.

Streptococcal toxic shock syndrome (STSS) has an 81 percent mortality rate. In December 1994, researchers noted a rise in STSS. They treated 21 cases from across Canada with intravenous immunoglobulin (IVIG) over the next five months. The out-comes were compared with those of 32 patients from Ontario who contracted STSS between 1992 and 1995, who did not receive IVIG. The 30-day survival rate was 67 percent in the patients who received IVIG, compared to 34 in those who did not.

"The creation of a province-wide network to study this disease over the last nine years, has not only allowed us to discover the mechanism by which this organism strikes, but more importantly, to evaluate new ways to treat this infection," says Dr. Donald Low, microbiologist-in-chief for Mount Sinai and Princess Margaret hospitals and professor of microbiology and medicine for the University of Toronto.

"Anecdotal experience with the use of IVIG, both at the turn of the century and in the late 1980s, suggested that providing patients with antibodies could neutralize the toxins produced by the bacteria," says Low. "That led us to the study of IVIG as a course of treatment during the late fall of 1994, in the face of escalating STSS cases."

STSS develops when a bacteria (group A streptococcus) produces a toxin that tricks the immune system into over-reacting. The body releases small molecules called cytokines, which cause fever, low blood pressure and leakage of fluid from blood vessels into surrounding tissue. This inhibits adequate flow of blood and oxygen to many organs, including the kidneys and brain, leading the person into shock and organ failure.

Group A streptococcus is a bacteria commonly found in the throats and on the skin of patients. It is most often the cause of bacterial throat infections (strep throat). At the turn of the century, this bacteria caused infections (such as scarlet fever) that were associated with a high mortality rate. For unexplained reasons, the severe complications associated with infections belonging to group A streptococcus almost disappeared from the mid 1930s until the mid 1980s, only to reappear in the form of STSS and necrotizing fasciitis (NF), the latter commonly referred to as flesh eating disease.

In 1992, there were 24 cases of STSS reported in Ontario. Nine cases developed necrotizing fasciitis, the flesh eating disease that is often associated with STSS. In 1994, the numbers had risen to 42 with STSS and 33 with NF. Between January and March of this year, there were 21 reported cases of STSS and nine of NF.

Financial support for the project was provided by The Canadian Bacterial Diseases Network.

The ability to identify additional patients across Canada was facilitated by the participation of physicians from the Canadian Infectious Disease Society.

Since the study, one of the patients who survived has started a foundation, Strategies for Life, to raise funds to support research in this field.

Baseball team settles for silver in New Mexico

By PAUL LUNGEN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — A pitcher who throws like Sandy Koufax and hits like Shawn Green stymied Canada's junior baseball team at the Pan American Maccabi Games, held recently in Mexico City.

Jason Brown, the 17-year-old phenom from California – whose fast ball crosses the plate at 85 miles per hour – was a one-man wrecking crew who gave the Americans an insurmountable edge in the gold medal game, acknowledged Mark Halberstadt, one of Team Canada's coaches.

Mark Bendahan, a longtime pitcher with Canada's Maccabiah softball team, coached the boys with Halberstadt's help.

Canada settled for silver after the 12-4 shellacking administered by the United States. Venezuela and Mexico were also-rans in the four-team event – the first time junior baseball has been featured at a Maccabi competition.

The baseball silver was one of 13 medals racked up by Canadian athletes at the quadrennial games. The host Mexicans led the way with 232 medals followed by the United States with 152. After that, it was a long way back to the third overall finishers, Argentina, which captured 36 medals.

The American baseball contingent was loaded with talent, Halberstadt said.

They were led by their pitcher, Brown, who will attend Stanford University on a baseball scholarship next season, he said.

The Americans were coached by Louisiana State University's top baseball man while most of the American squad hailed from warm weather locations, like Florida and California, where they play baseball eight or more months a year.

The 17-and-under boys junior baseball team at the Pan-American Maccabi Games in Mexico City. [Top row, from left] John Elias (coach); Mark Halberstadt (coach); Mike Nehemiah; Jordan Stroll; Jory Solomon; Benjamin Barnoff; Mitchell Sadofsky; Noah Bernamoff; David Dudkiewicz; Benjamin McPhee; Mark Bendehan (coach). [Front row, from left] David Bernholtz; Joshua Friedmann; Erik Brown; Jarryd Halberstadt; Jordan Beitel; Ryan Butkowsky.

One hundred and fifty youngsters tried out for the squad and the Americans brought 19 to Mexico City. They gathered for an intensive one-week training camp before heading to Mexico.

Fifty kids in Toronto and Montreal tried out for the team and organizers settled on a 14-man squad – eight from Toronto and six from Montreal.

Still, the Canadian kids acquitted themselves well and would have been competitive – except for Brown, Halberstadt suggested.

In an early, round robin matchup against the Americans in which Brown was rested, Canada lost 6-5 in a contest that could have gone either way.

But in the gold medal game, it was a different story. Brown suited up and threw a no-hitter for five innings and was hot with his own bat to stake the Americans to a 6-0 lead. In the sixth and next-to-last inning, the Canadians finally got to him, nailing him for four runs to make it interesting.

But in the seventh, the Americans turned on the juice and tagged Canadian pitchers for six more runs to grab an insurmountable 12-4 lead.

The Canadians played hard but were simply outmatched, Halberstadt said.

"They were game kids, but the Americans have been schooled a heck of a lot more than us. They were very capable ball players. They play baseball like we play hockey.

"They were lean and mean and very well schooled players."

Brown in particular was a force to be reckoned with. Not only did he throw at 85 mph, but also he showed a great curve and an equally good slider, Halberstadt said. If he continues to develop, he should be a pro prospect after he finishes college, he added.

Halberstadt was full of praise for the young Canadians, which included his son Jarryd, the team's 14-year-old catcher who plays for the Thornhill Reds Bantams.

"They were competitive, eager to go and they gave us 110 percent effort," he said.

Allen Gerskup, chair of Maccabi Canada's national athletic committee, said Canada is among the countries that is pushing to include junior baseball as an official medal sport at the 2001 Maccabiah Games in Israel.

The Pan Am Maccabi Games were an important test run for the idea, but it's still not clear whether the broader quality of competition exists to warrant including the sport in 2001, he said.

Let's get back to hockey

Test your Total Hockey I.Q. with this quiz:

1. Name the members of the following lines: the HUM Line, the Brat Line, the Boilermaker Line.

2. This Jewish Sudbury-born goaltender played only two games over three seasons in the early NHL, spending most of his career in the minors. Name him.

3.This Jewish Montreal-born defenceman was a second all-star in 1952 with the Rangers. Name him.

4. Name the first Western team to win the Stanley Cup.

Answers:

1. Detroit's mid-'60s HUM Line consisted of Paul Henderson, Norm Ullman and Bruce MacGregor; the Leafs' Brat Line of the 1970s included Tiger Williams, Jack Valiquette and Pat Boutette; Chicago's Boilermaker Line (1948-50) consisted of Roy Conacher, Doug Bentley and Bill Mosienko.

2. Joe "Kelly" Ironstone didn't see any action as a spare goaltender for Ottawa Senators in 1924-25. He played one game for New York Americans in 1925-26 and in 1927-28 he played one game for the Leafs, earning a shutout.

3. Hy Buller, known as the "Blueline Blaster," played most of his NHL career with the Broadway Blueshirts but was traded to the Habs in June 1954. He decided to retire at age 28 instead of reporting.

4. In February 1896, Winnipeg Victorias became the first Western Canadian team to win the Stanley Cup, at at time when champion teams from various leagues could challenge for it.

The Inside Back

Still funny after all these years

As I was saying...

By RON CSILLAG

Full disclosure: Sam Orbaum and I were friends in high school, and I delivered the now-defunct Montreal Star to his house, just around the corner from mine in the shtetl of Chomedey. I admired Sam for his wit and his writing ability. Even early on, the guy could swing a quill. (As a reporter for the school paper, he once asked for my thoughts on Mother's Day. "Shh," I replied. "Mum's the word." Sam roared, and went with it).

But even more, I respected his guts. Here we were, in a secular school that had its share of toughs (who congregated in a ground-floor breezeway to smoke, drink zillion-proof plonk and not exactly profess their love for the children of Israel), and here was Sam, the only guy at school who wore a kippah all the time.

I didn't witness it, but Chomedey High lore had it that one day, a ruffian knocked the yarmulke right off Sam's noggin. Sam, so the story goes, demanded that the item be picked up; said ruffian mentioned an anatomical impossibility; and fisticuffs ensued until teachers intervened. Sam never backed down, and never lost his sense of humor.

The kippah incident might be apocryphal, but the sense of humor is real. And it's come in handy for my friend Sam, who made aliyah in 1981 and went on to become a big-shot humor columnist for The Jerusalem Post. In regular dispatches, Sam regales all of Israel with his zany view of a country that should – must, if one wants to maintain any semblance of balance – be viewed zanily.

From tzuris with plumbers or electricians and a perennial bank overdraft (shades of Ephraim Kishon), to explaining a Canadian winter to his British-born wife, to telling millions about the every move of his three daughters (quite possibly, the most famous triplets in Israel), Sam has emerged as his country's Dave Barry, a long-suffering Everyman who pays his bills and endures every bureaucratic slight imaginable, but manages to find pearls of humor in any situation, whether real or the product of an imagination that never seems to quit.

Now, the good people at the Post have had the wisdom to publish his best stuff in book form. But Seriously is 286 pages, each of which will have you laughing out loud, and each of which will remind you that life in Israel is somewhat more challenging than in Cote St. Luc or Willowdale.

"Make a note of this date: 23 Tevet, 5760," Sam advises of the over-ballyhooed millennium. "You'll probably be among the 99.99999998 percent of humanity marking that day as Jan. 1, 2000. The other 0.00000002 percent of the species will be busy that day revoking kashrut licenses."

But Seriously

Sam Orbaum

Sam is obviously nostalgic for his frozen birthplace, whether through misty-eyed reminiscences of snow-removal machines, the absurdity of Quebec's sign laws, or imagining Front Page Challenge on Israeli TV. His beloved Prince Charles Street (on Jesus Island, he stresses, better known as Laval) "looked like Anatevka with bungalows," while the most inviolable street hockey rule as a kid was "the Two-Foot Guvmint Proppity Law," under which the first two-foot strips of everyone's lawn belonged to the government, and was thus a kind of sanctuary.

His new lyrics to old tunes are a hoot. Sam's ear for dialogue rivals that of Art Buchwald.

He even manages to find something worthwhile in the fact that he has cancer. Nothing funny about cancer? Sam thought so too, until the disease and its treatment taught him that humor is strength in sufferance. And he did have some funny moments...

But Seriously is not available in Canada (pity). But seriously, you can order it off the Web at www.jpost.co.il or from Sam directly at sam@jpost.co.il. Tell him I sent you.

About Seniors

Dear JESSE,

I recently retired and am having difficulty filling up my time. Although I spend time with my children and grandchildren, I need other things to do too. What do you suggest?

SV

Dear SV,

One of the nice things about being retired is that you can make up your own schedule. Although this increases your freedom and flexibility, it also presents you with new challenges.

I would suggest that you consider volunteer work. Organizations that serve seniors are very much in need of volunteers. You could drive people to medical appointments, take an agency client shopping, help pack for a move, write letters or e-mail grandchildren on behalf of clients, teach a homebound senior how to surf the Net, and more. The opportunities are endless.

Volunteering can be a very rewarding experience for both you and the recipient of your work.

Contact the federation office in your community to get more information on volunteering.

Readers are invited to send any questions they have for Jesse to The CJN. Jesse represents the management and staff of Jewish Support Services for the Elderly (JSSE) in Montreal

Progress for 13 Iranians?

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) is working closely with an internationally known retired diplomat to try and resolve the case of the 13 Iranian Jews detained on allegations of spying for Israel, The CJN has learned.

The diplomat, whose identity is not being made public, is negotiating with Iranian officials "at the highest level," CJC president Moshe Ronen told The CJN last Friday.

"He has been assured there will be a positive solution to this," Ronen added.

Largely as a result of international pressure and the efforts of the high-level envoy, Iran "appears to have softened" and "seems to be looking at a humanitarian way to conclude this." Ronen said the diplomat reports that Iran is examining several resolutions.

The retired envoy has the ear and respect of top Iranian leaders, Ronen said, adding that the United Nations and Israel "are aware" of his efforts.

CJC came into contact with the intermediary by way of Walter Arbib, a well-connected Toronto Jewish businessman who is president of Skylink, which charters helicopters and other aircraft.

Arbib has advised Ronen in the past on international matters, and has known the diplomat for several years. It was through Arbib's urging that the man agreed to take up the matter, Ronen said.

Canada's Foreign Affairs department and CJC are being briefed regularly on the envoy's efforts, Ronen added.

CJC involved behind scenes

He said influential Jewish leaders in the United States also approached the diplomat, "but Canada got to him first."

Ronen said the envoy is working with the Iranians both by telephone and through personal meetings. He did not comment on whether the man is in Tehran, where the 13 Jews are being detained.

Reports last week said that Tehran planned to formally indict the 13 Jews on Aug. 19. That did not happen, and Ronen says, "There is no question in my mind" that Iran did not move on the case because of the intermediary's efforts.

CJC's position calls for the Iranian government to unconditionally release the 13 Jews, who have been detained since March on charges of spying for "the Zionist regime." Ronen feels that if the matter is concluded positively, the international community should find ways to normalize relations with Iran.

Ronen has asked for a meeting with Foreign Affairs Minister Lloyd Axworthy, hoping that Canada would request the prisoners' unconditional release. This week, the Congress president is in Israel on private business, but he scheduled a meeting with Foreign Minister David Levy to keep him apprised of the diplomat's efforts.

He said Congress has been asking for a meeting with Iran's ambassador to Canada, so far to no avail.

Ronen, however, is advising that the envoy's mission will take time.

"I'm not prepared to say this matter has been resolved. It could take weeks, even months."

In the meantime, he said the diplomat has advised that international pressure on behalf of the 13 Jews should continue, but not escalate.

The News in Brief

Canada

Elementary School Moves

VANCOUVER — Vancouver Hebrew Academy has found a new home next to the Vancouver Jewish Community High School, at least for the next two years. The Jewish elementary school has signed a two-year agreement with the Vancouver School Board to move into the old Oakridge school on Baille Street.

New Rabbi Chosen

EDMONTON — Rabbi Ari Enkin of Montreal has been chosen as the new spiritual leader of Beth Israel Congregation. Rabbi Enkin, 24, and his wife Shana were expected to arrive here this month. The rabbi will take up his duties Sept. 1.

More Funds Needed

WINNIPEG — Community leaders here say they need a $1 million increase in the annual Combined Jewish Appeal campaign over the next four years. "In the past two years, we have been able to stabilize our campaign at around $3 million a year," said a recent report from the Winnipeg Jewish Community Council. But after surveying the community's needs, the committee estimates that the CJA campaign will have to rise to about $4 million a year.

Israel

Settler Acquitted

JERUSALEM — An Israeli court has acquitted Jewish settler Nahum Korman of charges that he killed a Palestinian boy in 1996. In the decision, the judge cited contradictory evidence given by two children. The human rights group B'Tselem condemned the acquittal.

Threat Against Peace Now

JERUSALEM — The mayor of a Jewish settlement on the West Bank threatened to "break the heads, the arms and the legs" of Peace Now activists if they returned to the West Bank to tour settlements. Ron Nachman made his comments following a verbal confrontation between Peace Now activists and residents of an enclave near the Jewish settlement of Itamar. A Peace Now official said he would file a complaint against Nachman.

World

Shuls Vandalized

LOS ANGELES — Vandals desecrated a synagogue in Los Angeles just days after white supremacist Buford O'Neal Furrow shot five victims at a Los Angeles Jewish community centre. Police said the attack on Temple Knesset Israel in Hollywood, which included a spray-painted swastika and the words "Jews die," appeared to be a copycat crime. And in New York, police are calling a synagogue arson on Aug. 15 in Long Island a hate crime. No one was injured, but some damage to the building was reported in the attack on Temple Beth Chai in Hauppage, N.Y. There are no suspects.

Vandal to be Sued

BERLIN — The Central Council of Jews in Germany plans to sue the Israeli man who poured black paint into the open grave of former council president Ignatz Bubis in Tel Aviv this month. The lawsuit against Meir Mendelssohn was expected to have been filed in a Frankfurt court this week. According to a Reuters report, Mendelssohn, whose act was barely noticed during the funeral, said Bubis used sympathy for his Jewishness in post-Holocaust Germany to make real estate deals.

No To Yom Kippur Request

UNITED NATIONS — The UN has refused a request to move the start of the General Assembly from Yom Kippur. In a response to the American Jewish Congress, UN Secretary General Kofi Annan said that only the General Assembly itself could revise the Sept. 20 date. Annan also apologized for any "discomfort that the decision of the General Assembly may have caused you and members of the Jewish faith around the world."

Canadians Graduate

NEW YORK — Thirty Canadians were among the more than 2,000 members of the class of 1999 who graduated this past May from Yeshiva University. The Canadians hailed from Toronto, Brampton, Ottawa, Hamilton, Montreal, Edmonton, Calgary and Vancouver.

Jewish Teen to Sue Over Star of David

JACKSON, Mississippi — A Jewish teenager plans to sue a Mississippi school board that declared a Star of David a gang symbol and order him to remove it.

The state branch of the American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU) will file the suit on behalf of 15-year-old Ryan Green.

The boy, a student at Harrison Central High School in southern Mississippi, wore a Star of David pendant to class earlier this year, but school officials said it was a gang symbol and made him remove it.

The policy forbids students from wearing anything that could be construed as a gang symbol. The Harrison County School Board voted this month to uphold the policy.

The board's argument is that some gang members use six-pointed stars, with other elements attached, as gang symbols. At least one gang, the non-Jewish Black Hebrew Israelites, uses the Star of David.

David Ingebretsen, director of the state ACLU, said there had been talk of banning crosses, but no action was taken. He said the board has singled out the Star of David for special attention.

Police seek leads in attack on seniors

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Police are appealing to anyone who may have information about the August 13 beating of two senior citizens on their way to Friday evening services at Torath Emeth Jewish Centre, to contact 13 Division.

"I don't care how small the tip may be," said Staff Inspector Ed Stewart, the division's commanding officer, last week. "We're appealing to anybody who saw anything suspicious at that time on that day."

(The public can contact the police division at 808-1300, or call Detective Joe Stubbs directly at 808-1306. Callers are requested to leave a name and phone number. Those who don't feel comfortable calling the police can call Crime Stoppers at 222-TIPS.)

Last week, police recovered an object "similar to a steel pipe," which they believe to be a weapon used in the attack. It was being examined by forensic experts.

The two suspects have been described as white males, age 19 to 20, about 5 feet 11 inches tall, of normal build, approximately 160 pounds. One was described as wearing a blue bandana with a pattern; the other, a black baseball cap.

There was nothing in their appearance to indicate a link with any hate group, said Stewart.

The incident is being treated as a hate crime and the police Hate Crimes Unit is assisting on the case.

"We're pulling out all the stops," said Stewart, adding that "this appears to be a very isolated incident.

"The main thing right now is to take our time to make sure we dot our i's and cross our t's and catch these guys, and prevent it from happening again."

The crowbar attack on Silvain Miller, 66, and Jacob Lazar, a 79-year-old Holocaust survivor, followed by three days Buford Furrow Jr.'s shooting spree at a Los Angeles Jewish Community Centre, which injured five people, among them three small children.

In Toronto, Jewish organizations, government representatives and the community at large expressed shock and outrage.

A non-Jewish woman called Miller long-distance to "apologize...for the ignoramuses in this society" and express her hope that the perpetrators would be caught.

Miller is "shocked and angry that it happened here in Toronto," he said last week in an at-home interview five days after the beating. "It was so unexpected."

Despite his words, his voice was calm and steady. He was resolute about his decision to talk to the media. "I think people should know," he said.

A native of Zurich, Switzerland, Miller recalls anti-Semitic incidents that took place when he was a schoolboy during World War II. But the recent attack is "worse than whatever I remember," he said. "I never saw anybody roughed up."

Miller, a grandfather whose avocation (Judaic artwork and calligraphy) provides an ironic contrast to the ugly incident, can't fathom what would cause a young person to brutally attack a senior citizen from behind. "They're sick in the head," he said.

It was like a scene from a movie, Miller recalled. He and Lazar were heading north on Bathurst Street toward Viewmount Avenue and were hit from behind after they turned the corner to attend evening services at the Orthodox synagogue.

Miller believes the younger men waited on the other side of Viewmount Avenue until nobody else was in sight and the cars on Bathurst were proceeding through a green light.

The perpetrators said nothing during the attack. All Miller heard was heavy grunting as they beat him and Lazar.

He remembers seeing his friend covered in blood, and screaming for help once a car appeared.

The attackers fled as soon as witnesses arrived, and the incident was over in less than 30 seconds, Miller estimates.

But the aftermath lingers. Lazar suffered facial and knee injuries. Miller has a bruise across his back, and his right cheek is a deep purple, with discoloration extending upward around his eye

Although Miller was aware of a few anti-Semitic incidents, he has always felt safe in the neighborhood, where he has lived for about eight years, he said.

"I guess you have to be a little bit careful," he conceded, "but it shouldn't change your lifestyle."

When evil laughs

Two inter-related news items crossed my desk last week. Because they are reminders that democratic values require protection, I have decided to share them with CJN readers.

On Aug. 18, the New York Times reported the following story: "Students returning to Columbine High School for the first time since a shooting rampage in April left 15 people dead there, were met by swastikas scratched on restroom walls and a brick wall outside the school.

"The two students responsible for the killings...had openly admired Adolf Hitler, and they opened fire on Hitler's birthday...

"Tammy Theus, the mother of one of 15 black students at Columbine High, and other parents patrolling the school before the start of classes, discovered the graffiti... They covered the symbols with duct tape until school officials could have them removed.

"'It's like they are laughing in our faces,' Ms. Theus said."

The "they" to whom Theus was referring, are, of course, the thugs and ignoramuses who shared a supremacist, hateful ideology with Dylan Klebold and Eric Harris, the students who cravenly carried out the Littleton murders.

It was indeed a severely unfeeling and sadistic person who would scrawl those swastikas.

Theus used a very powerful image to describe her indignation at this recent sinister behavior: evil's icy, sneering, malevolent taunt, "laughing in our faces."

It sends a chill down our spines.

Our sorrow is their entertainment; our grief is their cause; our democratic values are their call to anarchy, to arms and to murder.

With such people there can be no accommodation or compromise, for they attack the very foundations of democratic life.

The law, which is democracy's purpose and proof, must always reach against them with punches unpulled.

Could there be a more tangibly grotesque embodiment of evil's taunting sneer than the sight of Buford O. Furrow smiling to the media as he was taken into custody by the police two weeks ago in California?

On Aug. 20, the New York Times reported the following story:

"A federal grand jury indicted the white supremacist Buford O. Furrow Jr. on three felony counts in the killing of a Filipino-American letter carrier last week, as the government focused its prosecution on charges that could result in the death penalty.

"Mr. Furrow, 37, has been held without bail since he turned himself in and confessed to the killing and the shooting of five people at a Jewish community centre last week. He was charged with the murder of a federal employee, Joseph Santos Ileto; with the use of a firearm in the murder; and with the illegal possession of a firearm by a felon. Mr. Furrow has a previous felony assault conviction in his native Washington state."

The article made no mention of any charges that will arise or may have already arisen from the shooting spree at the North Valley Jewish Community Centre. But they will undoubtedly form part of the proceedings against Furrow.

Oddly, Furrow's "laughing at us" was not only in the thin, sickly, jeering line across his lips when he faced the cameras. It was also in the unusually calm, almost cavalier comportment after he killed and had attempted to kill.

"Mr. Furrow, for years a member of the Aryan Nations, a hate group based in Idaho, turned himself in to the Federal Bureau of Investigation in Las Vegas the next morning, after slipping through a massive police dragnet. He told the police that after the shootings, he had wandered around the streets of Hollywood, reportedly getting a haircut, shopping for a baseball cap and drinking a few beers before taking an $800 taxi ride across the desert and spending a night in Las Vegas.

"He was casual enough after the shootings, that he made his way about 20 miles to Hollywood and then went to...a sporting goods store...and tried on baseball caps."

Furrow's plan obviously included his capture. That is clear from the fact that, like all cowards, he only attacked people who could not fight back. Presumably, he intended his own capture for the possibility of either a propaganda pulpit from his trial or martyrdom from a death penalty, or both.

* * *

When evil "laughs at us," we cringe. Then, we must find our resolve, summon our strength and protect our democracy.

Benjamin Noy returns to Canada as trade envoy

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — There was a change of guard at Israel's consulate last week.

Yael Varsano-Barzilay, the consul for economic affairs, bid adieu to colleagues and friends as her successor, Benjamin Noy, was welcomed back to his old post.

At a reception in a downtown tower under the auspices of PricewaterhouseCoopers and State of Israel Bonds, Varsano-Barzilay described her four years in Canada as a "beautiful" experience, and acknowledged that she had learned to appreciate Israel even more while living and working abroad.

Noy, who held the position from 1989 until 1995, said that Canada has begun to attract Israeli investors, primarily in real estate and software.

David Sultan, Israel's ambassador to Canada, complimented Varsano-Barzilay, saying she had done "a great job" explaining Israel to the Canadian business community.

Pointing out that Israel and Canada had signed a free trade agreement while she was here, Sultan said that the volume of bilateral trade has increased by more than 60 percent since then.

Benjamin Noy

Eric Slavens, a PricewaterhouseCoopers official, said that she had diligently assisted in hammering out the final details of that agreement.

Calling her vivacious, charming, energetic and extremely capable, Slavens said she had led missions to Israel and had worked closely with Sergio Marchi, who recently resigned as Canada's trade minister.

Slavens said that the level of Canada-Israel trade has increased from about $300 million (US) in 1996 to over $500 million (US) last year.

And, he added, significant increases are expected in 1999.

Striking a cautionary note, Sultan said that, until recently, Israeli entrepreneurs focused on the United States rather than Canada when they thought of North America.

The reception attracted a fairly substantial crowd, including the consuls-general of Germany, Bulgaria and Mongolia.

Varsano-Barzilay's husband, his face wreathed in smiles, appeared bearing their rosy-cheeked infant in a hamper. During her four years here, she gave birth to two children.

Congregation revives obscure Jewish rite

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — An obscure Jewish rite is about to be revived next month at Kehillat Ahavat Hesed when rabbinical student Aubrey Glazer leads the egalitarian congregation for the High Holy Days.

The ancient mystical practice is known as Idra Zuta, an Aramaic term referring to a small teaching circle, believed to have been held on Yom Kippur, Lag B'Omer and Shavuot in 13th-century Castile.

Glazer, a 29-year-old Toronto native entering his final year of rabbinic studies at the Jewish Theological Seminary in New York, will conduct a Hacahana L'Idra Zuta (preparation for Idra Zuta), to take place on Sept. 8 at 8:30 p.m.

To the best of his knowledge, the custom has not been used anywhere else in recent years.

At Kehillat Ahavat Hesed, where Glazer has attended services on some of his trips back home, he will be building on a congregational Slichot tradition focusing on singing as a means of getting into the spirit of the High Holy Day services.

The congregation of approximately 70 families is "always interested in having a new experience," said board member Avi Rose of Glazer's suggestion for this year.

"Our group is very musically oriented," he added. "There's lots of singing and a very high level of participation at services."

Glazer and fellow members of Al-Kantarra, a Judeo-Arabic musical group in which he plays percussion, have led a similar, larger teaching circle – an Idra Raba – in New York for Lag B'Omer. Glazer has also held informal teaching circles in Paris, where he served as a rabbinic intern at a Masorti (Conservative) congregation last year.

The Idra Zuta will include the study of text from the Zohar as well as piyyutim, or liturgical poems, mostly of Judeo-Iraqui provenance, "so that people can leave with a new appreciation of a culture that is actually theirs," said Glazer.

JTS cantorial student George Mordechai, also a member of Al-Kantarra, will run the Idra Zuta with Glazer. Mordechai will be leading High Holy Day services in Riverdale.

While in town, Glazer will also run a series of "self-transformation" or tshuvah workshops, to be held at the Yoga Studio in downtown Toronto. There will be four sessions, running from 9:30 to midnight, Sept. 13 through 16.

The sessions will incorporate Jewish meditation and "practical Kabbalah" using breathing exercises and chanting from the Book of Psalms to prepare participants spiritually for Yom Kippur. (Participation is by pre-registration only, through the Yoga Studio, 416-923-9366.)

Kabbalah means "transmission of a teaching," Glazer told The CJN. "What I'm teaching is a very grounded way of recharging yourself."

Counselling service changes name to better reflect purpose

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — One of the community's better kept secrets is undergoing a name change, but no alterations to its mandate.

From now on, Torah Life and Living, Canada will be known as the Jewish Counselling and Resource Centre (JCRC) to better convey its purpose as a communal referral and counselling service for Jews plagued by drugs, cults and family problems.

The spare office and three-person staff will remain in a strip mall at Bathurst and Finch.

The group's modest presence belies its workload. Since it began operations two years ago, the number of cases before it has mushroomed to nearly 150.

About one-third of those involve Jews in cults, says JCRC executive director Rena Schochet.

The rest involve illicit drug use and Jewish families in crisis.

Schochet, a trained mediator and Jewish marriage counsellor, stresses that her approach is two-pronged: she advises entire families, not affected individuals, or she can refer people to specialists.

"By coming through my door, people can get to social workers, psychologists, psychiatrists and other outreach specialists," she says.

The organization is a registered charity, and is supported by donations from the community. Clients are encouraged to contribute what they can.

Schochet has also noticed that she's getting referrals from strangers, and even some "off-the-street" trade.

Hers, she says, is a holistic approach.

Try to empower families to solve problem

"We take on, not just the individual, but the entire family, and try to empower and encourage them to solve the problem. I try to get parents, children, siblings and spouses to strengthen one another in order to help them carry out advice."

Schochet also works in tandem with Jews for Judaism and Jewish Family & Child Service to help Jews exit from cults.

American studies have consistently shown that a high number of Jews, out of proportion to their numbers, are drawn to cults. Schochet says there's no reason to believe it's different in Canada, and that often, it is adults who get sucked in.

Torah Life and Living is a Florida-based outreach group that has offered U.S. Jews drug and anti-cult counselling for over a decade.

Schochet, the wife of Rabbi Avi Schochet, principal at Eitz Chaim Day School, imbues her anti-cult counselling with a strong Jewish component, "because part of bringing a person out of a cult is not leaving them in a vacuum. My thrust is to give them back their own persona, and to give them a place in the community."

She also sees plenty of Jewish families with problems, as well as couples experiencing marriage woes. Serious concerns, such as abuse, are referred to specialists.

"I will always try to save the marriage. I'll work with the couple to keep the family unit strong."

While the need for such a service may seem unfortunate, Schochet says the Jewish community of Toronto and York Region have expanded rapidly, and Jews are not immune from social ills.

"We are to the mental health profession what alternative health care is to medicine," she offers. "We listen."

Youth, women priorities for new JVS director

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Asked to suggest a motto for Jewish Vocational Services of Greater Toronto (JVS), the agency's new executive director doesn't pause: "It's about work."

The energetic Karen Goldenberg has been working away for only a few months, having replaced Ed Segalowitz who is now at the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto, but already, she has big plans.

For one thing, Goldenberg, 55, wants to dispel the notion that JVS does nothing else than find people jobs.

The agency, which marked its 50th anniversary last year, has come a long way since the post-war years when it was preoccupied with finding work, chiefly in the needle trade, for war veterans and newly arrived Holocaust survivors.

These days, with a staff of 135, it offers a slew of programs, training seminars, counselling and other services aimed at getting people into – or returned to – an ever-changing workplace.

So over the years, JVS has had to do more at the same time as governments have slashed funding.

"We in this agency have had to be tremendously resilient," observes Goldenberg, a trained occupational therapist who comes to JVS with extensive experience in both private and public sector health care and social service delivery. "We've had to do more with less, and become more accountable for what we do."

That's been especially true, she notes, when it's come to funding for services for the disabled.

"The times when governments doled out block funding are over. We now have to think and act like a private company in a market-driven economy."

Karen Goldenberg

JVS still receives the lion's share of its funding from the public purse. Three levels of government contribute, as do the United Way and UJA Federation.

And because it receives public money, the agency cannot cater solely to Jewish clients. About one-third of the 10,000 people it served this past year were Jewish.

In the coming months, Goldenberg expects that JVS will begin doing something it's never done before: fundraise in the Jewish community.

"It seems paradoxical," she concedes. "I have mixed feelings about it. It may look like we're competing with the UJA. But we simply don't have enough dollars to do everything we need to do."

Everything it needs to do is a lot. At last count, JVS offered 33 programs and services, with more to come. These encompass traditional job searching; help for new immigrants, including those needing training and re-training; career planning; computer skills upgrading for foreign professionals; and skill evaluations. Some are offered in conjunction with other communal agencies, such as Jewish Family & Child Service, Reena, and Jewish Immigrant Aid Services.

Goldenberg has set her priorities on programming for youth, women and single mothers.

And her "burning passion" is support for children under six. She wants to begin an educational program in this area for parents and caregivers in the Jewish community.

In the meantime, the agency will continue offering the services for which it's become known.

Jewish education is still a cornerstone, and its importance is expressed through the educational counselling services program, in which assessments and counselling are delivered to 10 Jewish day schools on 18 campuses. Last year, JVS served 4,200 students through the service.

Another mainstay – the Psycho-educational and Vocational Program, or PAVE – assesses learning skills and other factors that influence education and learning in teenagers and young adults.

The popular Women in New Roles (WINR) program helps prepare women for new careers or entry into the job market.

Thousands of other clients are served yearly through rehabilitation services, career and employment counselling, on-site skills training and guidance with self-employment.

This past May, JVS became a partner in Youthinc., which provides support services and employer links for young people. Students can also avail themselves of a workshop on study skills.

It's a tall order, and Goldenberg knows she has her work cut out.

"We do a lot, but it boils down to this: we're here to remove barriers to successful employment."

She's also eager to shore up JVS's image. For years, the agency has kept a low profile, away from the Bathurst Street strip (it's housed in a nondescript, crackerbox building in the Dufferin-Lawrence area).

Already, the director isn't shy about singing her agency's praises: "We're the jewel in the crown of the Jewish community," she says.

Relief fund to aid Turkey

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A special relief fund to assist in the rescue efforts in Turkey has been set up by the Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC).

"The magnitude of this earthquake is enormous and the losses are staggering," said CJC president Moshe Ronen. "I am urging members of the Jewish community to be generous and contribute whatever they can to this important humanitarian cause."

The money will be distributed either directly in the areas hit by the disaster or through an international relief organization.

Cheques should be sent to the Turkish Earthquake Relief, c/o Canadian Jewish Congress Charities Committee, 1590 Docteur Penfield Ave., Montreal, Que. H3G 1C5. Tax receipts will be issued.

Antonio Lamer

Even in his announcement, last weekend, of his intention to resign in January as chief justice of the Supreme Court of Canada, typically combining profound insight with profound humility, Mr. Justice Antonio Lamer showed Canadians how to reach for greatness.

He spoke of the "feu sacré," the sacred flame, "the necessary enthusiasm of spirit and intellect," that he now felt diminishing in his lifelong love for the law and for judging, a love that boldly and without flicker, lit his way from within the secret chamber of his soul.

For 20 years, he sat on the Supreme Court of Canada. For the last nine of those 20 years, he was the court's 16th chief justice.

Chief Justice Lamer solidified the court's transition from the quiet waters of 115 years of the British North America Act into the relatively untravelled and still-choppy waters of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, from pure parliamentary democracy to hybrid constitutional/parliamentary democracy.

It was, and is, difficult work, requiring a strong, firm hand on the the judiciary's schooner and a strong, clear eye on the horizon.

Critics from among the parliamentary supremacists assail the court as too interventionist, too willing to unseat the elected majority through unelected judicial activism. But, perhaps more than any other chief justice, Lamer has resolutely answered those critics.

With the precision and acuity of a ray of laser light cutting through a dark room, Chief Justice Lamer has articulately explained and staunchly defended the importance, indeed, the necessity, of reconciling the sometimes overbearing will of the majority with a sometimes irritating deference for the minority, of protecting the rights of the individual against the encroachments by the state.

There was no finer example of the delicate and reasoned way in which the Lamer court balanced complex and competing interests than the reference last year, concerning Quebec's right to unilaterally secede from Canada.

The court ruled that a unilateral declaration of independence by Quebec would be illegal. However, it also ruled that the government of Canada would be obliged to negotiate the terms of secession if a clear majority of Quebecers expressed their desire to leave in response to a clear question regarding secession. The judgment, like the court itself, was a paean to order, to fairness and to democratic values.

"Feu sacré" is as much a prescription for us as it is a characteristic of the chief justice. It is the flame that fires our imagination, that stirs our soul, that guides us, that directs us. It isn't simply the momentary passion that soars but disappoints once spent. It is, in the chief justice's word, "sacré", set apart from the ordinary. It is part of the defining signature of who we can be, each one of us.

Each one of us can achieve, if we but find and light the "feu sacré" that is within us all, or can be within us. For his example, for his judging and for much more, Canadians owe Chief Justice Lamer a great debt.

We wish him good health and fulfilment in all his future pursuits.

Mistake to set time limits on Barak's goals

Your editorial (CJN, Aug. 12), and reports almost every day in the daily press express pessimism and skepticism that all of Israel's Ehud Barak's promises can be accomplished in 15 months. It is important to bear in mind that for all practical purposes, Israel is the only functioning democracy involved in the process. Barak must satisfy a diverse constituency in order to continue as prime minister.

That is not the case for Yasser Arafat for the Palestinians or Hafez al-Assad for the Syrians. There is no consultative process but merely the directed decisions of dictators from those countries. In Lebanon, the government must take its direction from Syria and to a lesser extent from Iran and even Saudi Arabia. That is not to say that peaceful solutions are impossible but recognition must be given for the complexities of a democratic society.

There are some wonderful signs that the Arab world is finally starting to acknowledge Israel's right to exist, among them the favorable comments in the Syrian press and the historic meeting between Barak and the president of Algeria.

There will be a settlement in the near future with the Palestinians and there will be a confirmation of their de facto presence in Jerusalem notwithstanding pronouncements to the contrary.

The withdrawal from Lebanon has already been assured and it needs only the power brokers controlling the terrorists north of Israel to be brought under control.

Israel will relinquish most of the Golan Heights and there will be peace with Syria.

All of these resolutions are attainable but it would be a mistake to set unreasonable time frames to reverse negative attitudes and mistrusts that have existed for more than 50 years.

Tagged along to Baron Byng High School choir

Your article about the reunion of the Baron Byng High School Class of '39 awakened some fond memories (CJN, July 29). My late father, Bernard Flexer (Class of '44) was a member of Dr. D.M. Herbert's choir and, along with other former members, convinced him to come out of retirement and preside over the Baron Byng Graduates Choir in the late '60s and early '70s. I always enjoyed tagging along to choir practice and would slip into the alto section. The Soldiers' Chorus from Faust was one of the first opera arrangements they sang.

The Baron Byng Graduates Choir actually made a number of recordings, (on vinyl discs), which were purchased by family and friends. My father always spoke highly of his former music teacher, and it was evident that Dr. Herbert was loved and respected by his students.

Liked insightful essay on poet Eliezer Steinbarg

Please accept my belated sincere congratulation for the very insightful essay about Eliezer Steinbarg's "desire to mend the world." (CJN, June 10)

As a student in my native Cernovitz gymnasium, I studied Yiddish literature, and Eliezer Steinbarg's fables and poetry were my favorite subject.

My Yiddish library is home for several of Steinbarg's works. To this day, I go back, from time to time, relaxing by delighting myself reading his wonderful verses.

Few Canadian Jews in WWII were decorated

In his column, "Overlooked minorities" (CJN, Aug. 5), Rabbi Gunther Plaut writes about awarding of medals/decorations to American minority GIs during World War II.

Rabbi Plaut writes: "I suspect, that on the whole, Canada will not be greatly different from the United States; prejudice against minorities knows no borders."

A list compiled by David Rome and published by Canadian Jewish Congress in 1948, titled "Canadian Jews in WW2 — vol. 1 Decorations," shows the relatively few medals decorations awarded to some 16,000 Jews who served. Rabbi Plaut was right.

Found anti-Semitic graffiti in Poland

Like Rabbi Dow Marmur, I too recently visited Poland. The rabbi describes (CJN, Aug. 19) how several thousand people celebrated a Jewish cultural festival in Krakow. I wonder if Rabbi Marmur also saw in Krakow zydz kurwa (Jewish whores) plastered on a wall in Kazimierz, the Jewish quarter housing the five ancient synagogues. I found anti-Semitic graffiti in many places I visited during my 10-day stay, especially in Warsaw.

My cousin and I kept a journal of our trip in Poland, and I will be glad to send it via e-mail at ssg25@sprint.ca to anyone requesting it.

Arab states must confront Palestinian 'refugees' as well

By DOUGLAS DAVIS
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

Prospects for peace between Israel and the Palestinians are bringing harsh facts of life into sharp focus for Arab leaders.

Not only will they be losing the Palestinian issue as a cornerstone of Arab unity and Pan-Arab ideology, but they will be gaining a demographic problem that is, to a very considerable extent, of their own making.

When some 600,000 Palestinians left areas that came under Israeli control in the 1948 and 1967 wars, they were settled in refugee camps, primarily in Jordan, Lebanon and Syria, but also in the West Bank and Gaza Strip.

While Israel set a high priority on absorbing and integrating the 600,000 Jewish refugees who poured into the new Jewish state from surrounding Arab countries, the Arab hosts of the Palestinian refugees steadfastly refused to integrate or absorb their new arrivals.

Moreover, they consistently rejected entreaties – including offers of cash – from international refugee agencies and foreign governments to improve the living standards of the Palestinians.

The rationale was that refugees, impoverished in camps, would remain a blot on the world's conscience and a constant reminder that the conflict with Israel would not be resolved until all were permitted to return to their homes in Jaffa, Lod and Haifa.

But the crucial, unspoken subtext was that the refugees and their descendants would never feel sufficiently secure or comfortable in their transplanted homes to put down roots and decide to stay.

While conditions in the camps would remain grim enough to score the necessary propaganda points on the international stage, they would also keep the dreams of the refugees focused on returning to long-abandoned, real or imagined, olive groves and orchards.

Israeli leaders of all political hues have consistently rejected the notion of the Palestinian "right to return" and the issue was widely perceived as being one of the most intractable problems to be faced in final-status negotiations with the Palestinian Authority (PA).

Now, however, Jordan, Syria and Lebanon are apparently being persuaded to think again, and there are signs they are taking the first tentative steps toward accepting the new reality: the permanent absorption of their substantial refugee populations in the context of an Israeli-Palestinian deal.

But recognition that the Palestinians will, after all, be settled where they are, sends shivers down the collective spines of Arab host governments, according to a recent report in the respected Arabic weekly al-Wasat, which is published in Paris.

Writing from Beirut, Lebanese commentator Sarkis Naoum noted that nowhere is this unease more acutely felt than in Lebanon, which is still recovering from a devastating civil war, and where fragile ethnic and sectarian balances will be threatened by the settlement of up to 250,000 Palestinians.

"Whether as Lebanese citizens or as permanent residents with full rights, Palestinians are not wanted in Lebanon," Naoum said. "Many Lebanese, particularly Christians, gave vent to this fear by taking up arms against the Palestinians in 1975."

In a state where the top political posts are awarded on the basis of religious and ethnic numbers, the Lebanese have always had a phobia about converting the Palestinian refugee presence into a permanent fact of life.

The permanent incorporation of a large number of Palestinians not only challenges the Lebanese political system which is constructed on a precarious balance between Muslims and Christians, but also the very character of the country.

Moreover, Naoum pointed out, the predominantly Sunni Palestinians also threaten to upset the balance between Lebanon's two major Muslim sects – the Shi'ites are the other – "upsetting the equilibrium between them and rendering Lebanon more unstable."

The number of refugees who will be permanently resettled in Lebanon is expected to be restricted to some 267,000 who were displaced in 1948, of whom about 225,000 still live in refugee camps.

Some international organizations have calculated that the overall number will fall around 175,000 when the number of Palestinians who have emigrated and now hold third-country citizenship is taken into account.

Meanwhile, western diplomats are pointing to tangible signs that arrangements are already under way to facilitate the resettlement process.

In Jordan, Palestinians were once granted Jordanian passports valid for five years, but after the establishment of the PA the validity of the Jordanian passports was reduced to two years. The authorities in Amman have recently reverted to issuing five-year passports.

Both the Syrians and the Lebanese are now more receptive to proposals for improving living conditions in the refugee camps.

A large project to improve living conditions in one of Lebanon's major camps is nearing completion. However, the official Lebanese line is that the project was undertaken for environmental reasons.

In addition, Syria and Lebanon have recently relaxed restrictions on Palestinians traveling between the two countries, while Beirut has eased restrictions on Palestinians who seek to travel abroad.

Naoum recalls that after Jordan's late King Hussein expelled the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO) in 1970, it moved to Lebanon, where members transformed the many Palestinian refugee camps into fortified strongholds.

"But the fear of rising Palestinian influence in Lebanon was not a strictly Christian affliction. When the Lebanese saw that the Palestinians were intent on creating a state within a state in Lebanon, another faction – the Shi'ites – also took up arms against them."

The Lebanese, he said, were driven by fear that the increasing power of the Palestinians might lead to their permanent resettlement in Lebanon, particularly if the Arab states and the PLO failed to defeat Israel, and if the Israelis refused to allow the Palestinians back as part of a peace agreement.

During the 1982 Israeli invasion of Lebanon, the third major Lebanese faction, the Sunnis, also came to realize the danger posed by the Palestinian armed presence in the country

"After initially supporting the Palestinians as a force that would help to reverse the injustices they suffered under the Lebanese system," Naoum wrote, "the Sunnis changed tack after the siege of Beirut."

In 1982, Sunni leaders played an important part in persuading the Palestinian leadership to leave Beirut as Israel had demanded.

Fears of permanently resettling the Palestinian refugees in Lebanon have increased since the October 1991 Madrid peace conference.

This concern reached fever pitch in recent weeks, with the advent of Barak's more conciliatory government and the possibility of regaining momentum in the peace process.

"Since the Barak administration adamantly rejects the repatriation of Palestinian refugees to the land they fled in 1948 and 1967," noted Naoum, "and since the U.S. is sympathetic to the Israeli position, the Arab and international (particularly European) positions appear very shaky indeed."

The riot at Allan Gardens

Every day the Globe and Mail publishes the front page of one of its old issues that appeared on the same day of the month. The page, reproduced with its original typeface, sometimes goes back to the early part of the century and sometimes to more recent dates.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

When the paper reproduced its front page from June 9, 1965, I saw this headline: "Jewish Congress Blames Jews for Fomenting Mob Violence." Naturally, my eye was attracted to this item.

It started as follows: "In a hard-hitting statement issued yesterday, the Canadian Jewish Congress accuses unnamed individuals and groups of the Toronto Jewish community of creating a tense and inflamed atmosphere which erupted into the Allan Gardens Riot.

"The Congress, official spokesman for Jewry, adopted the unusual procedure of printing a circular for distribution to an estimated 20,000 Jewish homes in Toronto and Ontario. A small proportion of the mailing is in Yiddish."

The story continued on another page, which was not reproduced. But it was enough for me to recall an event in which I participated and which I remember very clearly indeed.

At the centre of the controversy was a certain William John Beattie, self-proclaimed fuhrer of the new Canadian Nazi party, which had announced a rally at Allan Gardens. This was a shock to the Jewish community, and especially to those of us who had personally experienced the effects of Nazi rule.

A fair number of us, especially members of a particularly activist group called N-3, were resolved to attend the announced rally and disrupt it if possible in as peaceable a manner as the circumstances permitted.

The rally made headlines; police on horseback cordoned off the area; and it was not long before jibes flew back and forth and a melee erupted. The result was that a few of the Nazis were beaten up and the rest fled. That was the end of the rally.

The event might not have made the news had some officers of Congress not decided to criticize us and let the media know that they were doing so on behalf of the organization, which up to this point had pursued a very conservative and low profile approach to most problems. I, in turn, approved thoroughly of the activism of N-3 and its allies. I always felt that, in the advocacy of genocide, the Nazis had placed themselves outside the protection of the law, and that to combat them with legal niceties was an error.

The interesting fact was that the leadership of Congress had read public opinion quite wrong. Veterans of World War II recalled what the Nazis stood for, and the resuscitation of such a philosophy in our midst met with wide public disgust. People generally were happy that the rally had ended as it did. One Jewish survivor was brought to court and was fined $1. The judge quite clearly agreed more with us than with our critics.

The most important effect of this whole episode, which after all lasted but a half-hour or so, was a change in the policy of Congress. Its previous low profile policies began to disappear. The leadership realized that the public criticism of our activities had been a mistake. It did not happen again.

Twelve years later, Rabbi Plaut was elected national president of Congress.

In search of family roots

Roots is a word that often pops up in my family's conversations. No, we are not obsessed with gardening or popular Canadian clothing, but with the past. Or rather my mother is obsessed with the past. She is searching for her roots, attempting the daunting task of tracing our family tree.

Jennifer Fox in Thornhill

Her project has lasted for many years. I've never asked why it's so important to know the name of her great-great-uncles and aunts. She says she does it for the stories – a sociological study of how her ancestors and mine lived.

As she progresses, she finds that the names and borders shift, making her task harder. Towns that were once in Belarus are in Russia, and then in Belarus again. Or they have disappeared completely off the map. It's like explaining to your grandkids that one day you woke up and no longer lived in Dartmouth but in the Halifax Regional Municipality.

Some families are lucky enough to trace their ancestral line back for generation after generation because their family was wealthy or had important rabbinical scholars. We stop at the mid-19th century. However, every time she finds another writer, my mother insists my penchant for journalism is part of my genetic code. Unfortunately, there is also a tendency to live in the "suburbs" of cities. Amazing, really. Even Imperial Russia had suburbs.

The search continues. E-mail after e-mail. Pile of paper after pile of paper. No goal in sight besides the need to know more about where we come from; yet I've always thought the answer was obvious. We are Canadians, or more specifically Montrealers, (except for me, the lone Ontario-born child) who uprooted themselves and took the long way to Toronto.

Why is it that I'm a Canadian everywhere but in Canada? When I travelled through Israel, the tour group was introduced as Canadians. Same thing happens when visiting the States. Where are you from? Oh, I'm from Canada (eh).

Here in Toronto, I'm not a Canadian at all. When asked, what I am, I instead reply that I'm Jewish and a long time ago, we were from eastern Europe.

But I'm not from eastern Europe. I've never been there; neither have my parents and neither have two out of four grandparents. I'm Russian the same way people who have never been to Ireland are Irish. I have a feeling that even when my family did live in Russia, they didn't consider themselves Russians.

The status of Judaism as a religion or as a culture is a never-ending debate. An overnight camp I attended used to ask us, are you a Canadian Jew or a Jewish Canadian?

The argument was always heated; people passionately pleaded both sides. I would always sit on the fence and ask why they couldn't have equal weight.

I believe that both my nationality and my religion/culture have an impact on the answer to the ever-present question of who I am. Being Jewish in Canada is vastly different than being Jewish in the United States. Over the past year of articles, I think I've proved that being Jewish in Toronto is not even the same experience as being Jewish in Halifax.

This all still leaves me with the puzzle of why people like my mother search for their roots. Are they yearning for a connection to something larger than a mere 100 years in our fair nation? To recall what was lost and what we left behind? If we know this, are we better people? Are we better Jews?

My mother continues to search, going to conferences and society meetings, sending out faxes and posting things on the newsgroup, looking for a link to someone or something else. I guess one day she'll stop. On that day I wonder if she will know herself any more than she did when she started.

Compiling lists as camp season ends

I lie on my top bunk-bed as the first rain of the summer makes a tapping sound on our roof. It is mid-August and we have just endured and survived the worst drought of the century.

Erica Horn in Montreal

Color war ended last night (my losing streak is finally over) and having been active in 110 degree weather for seven weeks the camp is exhausted.

We are rewarded for our endurance and motivation throughout the heat with "Bunk-O" – translated as "do whatever you want provided one counselor is alert at all times."

My 18 campers have shut the lights and are sleeping and my co-counselors have decided to join them. I lie here, listening to the pitter-patter of the rain, pondering the highlights of the past seven weeks and the events and the tribulations of the year ahead. I compile a Top 10 list for each and below I have decided to share some of it with you.

The top two things that make camp life different and therefore better than our home lives are:

1.The friends you make at camp are closer than family. The bonds of friendship formed throughout camp are unbreakable and must withstand the test of time.

My supervisor recently shared with our division some wisdom on the value of camp friends. There are friends of the road and friends of the heart. The friends you make at camp are friends of the heart. You can be physically apart from them 10 months of the year, but upon being reunited it is as though you never left each other's side.

When I peer outside my window in mid-February and am depressed by the feet of snow covering the ground, I know that if I look up into the sky, my friends of the heart are looking up at the same clouds, the same stars and the same sky. Mutual experiences and memories connect us. We are together even when we are apart.

Moreover, at camp you are alongside your friends 24 hours a day, seven days a week. I know that the moment I set foot off the plane, once I have finished my laundry and have showered barefoot for the first time in two months, I will turn on my computer, log onto the Internet to chat with my camp friends. I will attempt to recreate the splendor of being able to be around my friends all the time and whenever I need them. Where else is an individual granted such a luxury?

2. Camp is for the kids. While principals and teachers can try to convince me that school is also for children, they will not succeed. School prepares kids for the future and trains them to handle the world as it is handed over to them by the older generations. In camp, everything is done with the best interests of the campers in mind and aims to provide them with two months of fun and laughter beneath the protective rays of the scorching sun. For example, my camp's motto is "The place where happiness counts."

After completing that list, I realized the harsh reality that the end of the summer was drawing nearer. To ease myself into the upcoming year, I compiled another Top 10 list and the following are the top two upcoming events of the 1999-2000 school year (for now):

1. In May, I will be graduating from McGill University. I will either be setting foot into the "real world" or returning to the exciting land of academia. The uncertainties with which I will be faced are already overwhelming.

2. In 105 days from my deadline for this column the world will be celebrating the turn of the millennium. Wild parties, nervous air traffic controllers and others will attempt to usher in the new millennium with as a large a bang as this one is ending with. It remains unclear whether glitches in computer systems have been successfully repaired or what the future holds. I suppose we will have to wait and see.

The bugle has blown for lunch. My campers are stirring, tying their shoes and trying to locate their ponchos. Macaroni and cheese awaits us. So does a noisy dining hall, filled with 400 cheering voices. Those same voices will be celebrating the new millennium beneath the same bright sky. I wish everyone the best of luck with their sad summer goodbyes and in the new school year.

The Kirshner File

Does Syria want peace or a peace process?

There is finally movement on the Syrian diplomatic front, three years after Israel suspended bilateral negotiations with Syria.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

The signals are unmistakable.

In line with Syria's demand, Israel has agreed to resume the talks from the point they broke off in February 1996. It is an important concession, since the previous Israeli government rejected that formula.

Urging Syria to seize a "historic opportunity," Israel has also stated that such negotiations can be based on United Nations Resolution 242, which calls for Israel's withdrawal from Arab territories.

The thorny, deal-breaking questions to be settled are twofold: where the talks ended, and the depth of Israel's pullout. These issues may yet scuttle talks, as Syria suggested last week in rejecting direct negotiations with Israel and likening Prime Minister Ehud Barak to his predecessor, Benjamin Netanyahu.

Prior to these chilling pronouncements, Syria let it be known that a resumption of negotiations was possible and indeed probable now that Netanyahu is gone.

President Hafez al-Assad, having described Barak as a "strong and honest" leader, said that his assumption of power provided "opportunities for constructive efforts toward a comprehensive and just" peace.

Confident that the climate has changed, Foreign Minister Farouk al-Shaara stated that Israel and Syria have already worked out 80 percent of the details. Walid Mualem, the Syrian ambassador to the United States, declared that Syria and Israel could come to terms in a matter of months by building on what had been achieved from 1992 to 1996.

Adding credence to the perception that Syria is ready to discuss peace seriously were unconfirmed reports suggesting that the Syrians had begun, or were planning, to rein in Hezbollah, as well as radical Palestinian factions in Damascus.

Yet a troubling question mark remains, these developments notwithstanding. Does Syria want peace or merely a peace process? There is evidence for both points of view.

Gen. Uri Saguy, the former director of Israeli military intelligence, believes that Assad took a "strategic decision" to make peace in 1991. As a result of this assessment, the late Yitzhak Rabin entered into direct talks with Syria in 1992.

Israel's current director of military intelligence, Gen. Amos Malka, concurs with his predecessor. In a recent visit to Washington, he told Clinton administration officials that Assad, whose health is at best uncertain, seeks a peace treaty with Israel so that his son, Bashar, can replace him without major jolts.

According to this theory, Assad, who was recently elected by acclamation to yet another term, wishes to defuse Syria's conflict with Israel so that his heir apparent, Bashar, an ophthalmologist, can concentrate on modernizing the anemic Syrian economy and updating its information and financial policies.

Syria's oil reserves, which generated some $2 billion in revenue last year, are fast being depleted. And Syria is also worried that its economic growth will not keep pace with its population increase.

The biggest problem turns on the nature of Syria's economy. Since it is largely state-controlled, Syria has no private banks and no stock exchange, and the legal and taxation systems are chaotic. The Internet, until recently, was illegal, and the use of cell phones is still subject to tight controls.

Syria, in short, has not joined the global economy, and now wants in.

This is reason enough for Syria to settle its long-running dispute with Israel. But the motive that ultimately underpins Syria's interest in reaching some kind of a rapprochement with Israel is national pride. Syria hungers for the return of the Golan Heights, captured by Israel in the 1967 Six Day War and formally annexed 14 years later.

Assad was commander of the air force when Syria lost the Golan, and he feels that he has a personal obligation to recover it. (Syria's position is that Israel must not only withdraw to the June 4, 1967 lines, but it must commit itself to that position before talks get under way.)

By making peace with Israel, Syria can, in addition, improve its strained relationship with the United States and thereby qualify for American aid.

Taking all these factors into account, Itamar Rabinovich, Israel's former chief negotiator on the Syrian track, takes issue with those who argue that Assad is only playing with the idea of peace.

"I do not share this interpretation," he wrote in The Brink of Peace, published in 1998. "I believe that when he agonized over George Bush's invitation to the (1991) Madrid conference, Assad did think through the full ramifications of a positive answer and made a decision to join a process that could very well lead him to sign a peace treaty with Israel."

Daniel Pipes, an American academic, leads the chorus of naysayers suspicious of Assad. "His goal," he has written, "is not peace but a peace process."

Ehud Barak

Sustaining a peace process, Pipes argues, confers upon his regime prestige and an implicit guarantee that Israel will not attack Syria.

By rejecting peace, he adds, Assad burnishes his credentials as an Arab nationalist and a defender of the Palestinian cause. He also deflects domestic attention away from the fact that his is a minority Alawite government.

"Bellicose relations with Israel help Assad stay in power and extend his influence," Pipes claims. "Refusing to accept the existence of the Jewish state provides him with a foreign enemy to unify the country, to strengthen the bond between the rulers and the ruled, and to mobilize the (majority) Sunni population."

He concludes: "The implication is clear: the Arab-Israeli conflict will continue so long as Assad rules Damascus."

In an echo of Pipes' theory, Shabtai Shavit, former head of the Mossad, said in 1996 that Assad hoped to use talks with Israel to win U.S. support and Western economic assistance without actually taking the steps to achieve peace.

Yossi Beilin, the deputy foreign minister under Shimon Peres and, currently, justice minister, contends that Assad fears a settlement. Writing two years ago, Beilin observed: "Assad (is) afraid that peace... would open Syria to the dangerous ideas of democracy and freedom and might jeopardize his tyranny."

Barry Rubin, an Israeli scholar, contends that Assad desires neither war nor peace, and is pleased with the existing situation. Peace, he wrote in 1998, would diminish Syria's influence in Lebanon and reduce Syria to a "fourth-rate power."

Uri Savir, who succeeded Rabinovich as Israel's Syrian negotiator and wrote a book about his experiences called The Process, says that Assad wants peace but is intimidated by it.

As he put it: "At our meetings it soon became clear that (the Syrians) ... sought American economic aid but wanted to block the penetration of any kind of Westernization that might come with it. They were interested in an accommodation with Israel but feared being overwhelmed by (Israel's) economic strength. The solution they were seeking was aid without influence and peace without engagement."

These are telling comments, yet Assad has gradually adjusted himself to coexistence with Israel, however difficult it may be to swallow. Assessing his options in light of Israel's peace agreements with Egypt, Jordan and the PLO, he has decided that the benefits of peace outweigh its disadvantages.

But, judging by a recent survey released by Tel Aviv University, Israelis are far from convinced that Israel should give up the Golan in exchange for peace.

The gefilte fish line

By ZE'EV GLICENSTEIN

How do you like your gefilte fish, sweet or peppery? The answer may reveal more about yourself and your family history than you might think.

Believe it or not, social scientists have made a serious study of the gefilte fish preferences of Jews whose families originated in eastern Europe. The results need not be taken with a grain of salt – nor with a healthy dose of chrain (horseradish).

You've heard of the Mason-Dixon Line? The 49th parallel? Michael Steinlauf, an American professor of Jewish studies and author of the book Bondage to the Dead, recently told an audience of genealogists that a similar boundary can be drawn across the map of eastern Europe – the "gefilte fish line," he called it – separating the regions where Jewish palates once favored the sweet gefilte fish from those where the peppery varieties of this traditional dish was preferred.

Speaking earlier this month at a huge international gathering of Jewish genealogists in New York, Steinlauf explained that the Gefilte Fish Line roughly overlaps another important line, a linguistic divide between two major variants of Yiddish.

Do the European-born Yiddish speakers in your family carry a Litvak accent? A Galitzianer accent? Like Henry Higgins placing Londoners by their speech, Yiddish linguists can often precisely determine a person's native region by their pronunciation of certain Yiddish words, and have mapped out these regional dialects of the mameloshen or mother tongue. It should come as no surprise, therefore, that our taste buds likewise carry significant clues about where we came from.

Steinlauf wasn't the only speaker to urge family tree researchers to look around their own homes for telling clues about their family's past. Rafael Guber, an American genealogist, artist and curatorial designer, spoke on Using Documents and Ephemera to Retrace Your Ancestors' Footsteps.

Many items in your home, such as old prayer books, marriage contracts, ritual washing cups and phylacteries, may carry clues about how our ancestors lived, he said. Prayer books, for instance, may indicate whether our ancestors were Chassidim. Guber evoked more than a few gasps from the supposed expert family historians in the audience when he noted that roughly 80 percent of present-day Ashkenazi Jews have chassidic roots.

Displaying photographs of various types of shtreimls and koppels (head coverings) worn in the Old World, Guber indicated where each regional variant of the fashion could be found. Even a gravestone in an old photograph can offer a geographical clue, he explained, since only in central and western Galicia did tombstone carvers place clearly visible inset stones within larger monuments.

Guber ended his talk with a sort of Jewish Antiques Road Show, during which audience members came forward with documents, photographs and other ephemera for evaluation. The exercise was highly entertaining, even if no one learned anything new about their families. Still, the point was clear: genealogists can play detective right in their own living-rooms.

The 19th Annual Conference on Jewish Genealogy attracted some 1,200 people, almost double the number at last year's conference in Los Angeles, and inspired feature articles in both the Forward and the New York Times. Most observers agree that the continuing growth of the Jewish genealogical community is attributable to one factor above all others – the widespread use of the Internet.

As the New York gathering made clear, we're in the midst of an explosion of information and interest in Jewish genealogy. Each day, we're reconfirming the unity of the Jewish people by recovering more and more of our genealogy. Watch this space for more about this exciting conference.

Going on a klezmer hunt

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

This is an article about Tzimmes and Kugel. About Hot Latkes and Schnapps. And of course, about Raisins and Almonds.

No, it's not about Jewish cooking. But, how klezmer music is cooking around the world (thanks to groups like Tzimmes [http://www2.portal.ca/~jsiegel/tzimmes.html], Kugel [http://members.aol.com/shawnkugel/kugel.html] and many, many other Klezmer groups).

There is no better place to start your hunt for just about anything klezmer than at Ari Davidow's Klezmer Shack [http://www.klezmershack.com/]. This massive site is dedicated to all aspects of contemporary klezmer music with sections devoted to KlezNews, KlezCalendar and Klez Links.

Davidow also provides a concise and readable history of the rebirth of klezmer music and defines what klezmer music is (and isn't). [http://www.klezmershack.com/ articles/aboutklez. html].

"It's balkans and blues, ancient Jewish culture and prayer and history, spirit and jazz all mixed together. Good klezmer, and the music inspired by it, demands that one dance... Some of it lies with an approach to playing that I still don't know how to describe, but includes a lot of Central- and Eastern-European riffs and that mysterious 'krechts'... that soulful burst of intensity that the lead musician, often a clarinet, will play, almost like an instrumental complaint."

Leo Rosten continues from the Joys of Yiddish: "The word klezmer comes from two Hebrew words, clay and zimmer, meaning vessel of music or song.

"The idea is that the instrument i.e. the violin, clarinet, takes on human characteristics like laughing and crying. With a joyous exuberance or a soulful wailing" [http://www.users.drew.edu/jbazewic/hst/klesmer.html].

Back at Klezmer Shack, there are dozens of articles on such topics as Klezmer Drumming, Klezmer Music Theory and a piece from the San Francisco Chronicle on a city where the music is surprisingly popular:

"In today's Berlin, It's hip to be klezmer. The playful Jewish music is the rage in Germany's biggest city, and a community once wiped out is getting back on its feet" [http://www.klezmershack.com/contacts/klezwords. html].

Klezmer's popularity is an international phenomenon. This year alone, klezmer music has been celebrated at KlezFest in St. Petersburg, Mazltov! in Holland, and the Israeli Fest in Tzfat. But one of the largest parties starts Monday at Toronto's Harbourfront Centre with Ashkenaz: A Festival of New Yiddish Culture [http://www.ashkenaz.org/].

Over 175 artists from 10 countries are scheduled to entertain longtime fans and introduce a new generation to Klezmer, with programs like OY VEY! Klezmer for Kids.

Do you want to track down a great Klezmer clarinetist you heard on a CD or maybe assemble your own Klezmer band? KlezContacts has e-mail addresses for everybody who's anybody in Klezmer music [http://www.klezmershack.com/klezcontacts.html]. And you can find almost 100 Klezmer links at the Klezmer Ring [http://www.webring.org/cgi-bin/webring?ring=klezmer;list].

You don't have to be a genius to feel the power of these songs (but I guess it doesn't hurt). Zemerl's home page [http://www.princeton.edu/zemerl/] contains this fascinating quote from a famous observer: "The Yiddish folk songs, why they are the most sincere, the most heartfelt I have heard anywhere. They are the truest expression of the soul of a people."

Albert Einstein.

Through A Sephardi Window

Healing the world

By AVI BENLOLO

Dr. Rachel Higgins aspires to find a cure for cancer. Her scientific arena – it encompasses molecular biology and molecular engineering – is one that few people are aware of, or comprehend. Yet her work will serve to benefit humankind.

The goal of her current research at the department of cancer research at Sunnybrook and Women's Health Science Centre, is to understand the development and progression of leukemia.

Backed by the Leukemia Research Funds of Canada, Higgins essentially tries to determine what happens after the cancer virus enters the organism. She believes figuring out this piece of the puzzle will bring scientists closer to finding a cure for cancer.

Soft spoken and modest about her numerous achievements, Higgins recently won the Governor General's Fellowship Award for her research paper titled Gene Silencing Due to Integration of Friend Murine Leukemia Virus into an Origin of DNA Replication. The award still sits neatly in its package waiting to be hung.

Born in Casablanca, Higgins moved to Israel with her family as a preschooler and was raised in Acre. Drafted into the Israel Defence Force when she was 18, Higgins chose to become a special needs teacher, a move that would have an impact on her future career choice.

As a young educator working with children with special needs, Higgins, at first, could not accept the fact they could not improve. She later learned that their disorders were genetic and decided she wanted to study genetic disorders.

As a result, she immigrated to Canada in 1976 for the purpose of going to university to study sciences, specifically in the area of genetics. While working on a bachelor degree, Higgins decided to get married and have children. The mother of two, she later graduated in 1986.

She received a master's degree in medical biophysics in 1989 and a Ph.D. in medical genetics in 1994. Both post graduate degrees are from the University of Toronto. Her doctoral work on the mechanism by which DNA is packaged into the shell of the virus, was published in the prestigious scientific journal, Cell, among many other publications.

Higgins said she recently had the opportunity to explore genetic replication, one of the more "sexy" areas in scientific research.

Working closely with world-renowned scientist Jerald Hurwitz in New York, she studied the mechanism of DNA replication in human cells.

Her background is as much a part of her life as her quest to find a cure for cancer. Hoping to pass on Jewish Moroccan values to her children, Higgins often cooks Moroccan food and celebrates holidays in the Moroccan tradition. She sent her children to Or Haemet Sephardic School in their early years and visits Israel periodically.

Talking about her drive and motivation to continue her difficult task, Higgins said, "Often when I wake up in the morning or while conducting experiments, I envisage a sea of people…and I remember that I am working on their behalf."

Life and the Times

Books
Bernard Baskin

The Times of my Life and my Life with the Times*, by Max Frankel (Random House, $41.95).

The New York Times is, arguably, the best known newspaper in the world. It is a giant mart stocked with information – more than 100,000 words on weekdays and half a million on Sundays. Unfailingly and efficiently, it packages the news and presents it daily to a huge and eager readership.

But what is newsworthy? The author of this diverting and informative memoir believes that "fear and anxiety are the most persistent stimulants of news – fears of war, crime and sickness will always attract a crowd: News by definition, therefore, is the unusual and the unaccustomed – what you rush to tell your neighbor."

As a child, Frankel fled with his mother from Germany on one of the last visas issued by the U.S. Embassy in Berlin after the outbreak of war. His father disappeared into Stalin's Russia for seven years, not to reappear and rejoin his family until 1946.

When Frankel graduated from Columbia University, he was hired by the Times where he spent the next 40 years. He held almost every important position on the paper: foreign correspondent in Moscow, Washington Bureau Chief, editorials editor and executive editor.

What is noteworthy about the honest and bracing book are Frankel's recounting of the Times' involvement in major events at which he had a ringside seat. These included: The Cold War, the Hungarian revolution, the Cuban missile crisis, the Pentagon Papers and Watergate.

Some of his disclosures are startling. "There was never much danger," he reveals, "in a nuclear exchange in the Cuban crisis, and those of us with some experience of Khrushchev felt sure of it throughout. We were wrong about his intentions in Cuba but not about his sanity. Khrushchev believed in nuclear diplomacy and bluff, never in nuclear war."

It is not widely known, he writes, that Kennedy promised Khrushchev secretly that he would soon scrap American missiles in Turkey provided no one in Moscow ever linked that withdrawal to the Cuban settlement.

Readers of The CJN will be especially interested in the author's considerable concern with Jewish matters. He admits that among his major mistakes was a 1981 editorial denouncing Israel for its "surgical" air strike against an Iraqi laboratory working on nuclear weapons. He concludes that it is folly to hold nations to a standard of "law" in an anarchic world. "Better to acknowledge the jungle until we reach a higher stage of civilization, or at least a world government."

Although he was widely criticized for his dovish views on Israeli policy, Frankel declares "The Torah, our Declaration and Constitution combined, urges a faith in law as the only reliable restraint on human behavior, the only alternative to violence and war. And the democratic codification of law requires debate and dissent. Instead of idols and passions, I worshiped words and argument, becoming part of an unashamedly Jewish verbal invasion of American culture."

Readers of this tough and scrupulous work will learn many things about how a great newspaper works: how it arrives at decisions, large and small; the relationship between editor and publisher, the journalistic codes of reportage and behavior and the foibles and eccentricities of well-known newspaper personalities and the behavior of assorted newspeople.

Not forgotten in this long and absorbing account are Frankel's description of his close relations with members of his family – the sad decline of his wife into depression and early death, and his romance and happy marriage to Joyce Purnick who was the Times City Hall bureau chief – and their influence on his career and principles.

Across the pages of this book march a galaxy of well-known personalities including five presidents of the United States and figures involved in politics, government, diplomacy and the arts.

At the book's end, looking back reflectively on four decades of change and turbulence, the author concludes, "Those who would truly stop the presses and seal the frontiers of nations and knowledge reappear in every generation, with tempting philosophies and contempt to humanity. By their press shall ye know them. They will cause new floods. But I have flown, like Noah's dove, with the spirit of the ark."

Special needs kids get program

By NICOLE SALAMA
Student Intern

TORONTO — For the first time ever, Reena, Zareinu, the Bathurst Jewish Centre (BJC) and Jewish Family and Child Service (JF&CS) are joining to create a new program: The Kids Club.

According to Arlene Margolese, the manager of volunteer services and Judaic programming at Reena, The Kids Club is a "unique social and recreational program for children with special needs."

The Kids Club's aim is to "enable people with developmental disabilities to realize [their] full potential by forming lifelong partnerships with individuals and their families within a framework of Jewish culture and values," Margolese says.

The program will have three sessions, the first starting in October. They are structured "to enable children with special needs to access quality social, recreational programs which do not currently exist within the Jewish community," said Margolese.

The program is available for two age groups: from three to six and from seven to 12. A "play and learn" program focusing on the arts, drama, music, fitness and Judaica, it will be held on Sunday mornings at the BJC.

Not only will The Kids Club "enhance [the children's] participation, enjoyment and social opportunities," but it will "give their families respite," says Margolese.

The families feel there is a real need for such programs. They believe that until now, their children have not had the same opportunities as other children, she says.

Because one of Reena's fundamental principles is their "obligation to advocate for appropriate programming for children," they, along with Zareinu, the BJC and JF&CS, decided to start the program.

The joint initiative has numerous advantages, Margolese says. It fills a need for the children and families who participate. It also "provides an opportunity for agencies with diverse mandates to work together to answer [that] need in the community."

The program is funded by UJA Federation, but there is still a cost of $100 per child per session.

Each session can take 20 children, Margolese says, and the staff-child ratio is excellent at one staff for two children.

She also stresses the need for volunteers. They must be at least 16 years old, and, she adds, they will find it a "terrific opportunity" to help developmentally disabled children.

Former York U president maintains busy schedule

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Although Harry William Arthurs can look back with satisfaction at an extraordinary career, retirement is hardly on his mind.

A teacher and a legal scholar, and once one of Canada's most notable labor arbitrators, he was York University's first Jewish president.

Looking considerably younger than 64, Arthurs is still very much on the go.

"I don't intend to retire, at least not tomorrow," he said. "That's the wonderful thing about being an academic. If your brain holds out, and your computer doesn't crash, you can continue."

True to his beliefs, Arthurs, the father of two grown sons, Joshua and Gideon, is as busy as ever.

At York, he teaches labor and administrative law, as well as a cutting-edge course on globalization, a topic he is studying thanks to a $249,000 grant from the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council of Canada.

Totally engaged in this project, Arthurs is trying to understand the impact of globalization on democratic institutions. "This has turned out to be a wonderfully productive period for me."

Arthurs, whose wife Penny is a garden designer, is also a member of a team which evaluates the performance of universities. His most recent assignment took him to the University of Wisconsin.

And occasionally, he conducts inquiries for universities beset by various problems. He headed up an independent committee at Concordia University following an academic scandal, and he helped Trent University reconstitute its senior administration after a faculty strike.

A University of Toronto and Harvard Law School graduate, Arthurs is an accidental academic. In 1961, when he was practising labor law, he was asked to fill in for a lecturer at York's Osgoode Hall Law School. "That was 38 years ago, and I'm still doing it."

Arthurs, who was successively associate dean and dean of York's law faculty from 1968 to 1977, oversaw sweeping changes. "I helped bring about a pedagogic revolution in legal education at Osgoode Hall," he said.

He developed an interdisciplinary approach for Osgoode Hall, introduced new courses, increased and diversified the faculty and hired an unprecedented number of women. (One of them, Louise Arbour, the chief prosecutor of the International Criminal Tribunal in The Hague, was recently appointed to fill a vacancy on Canada's Supreme Court.)

Arthurs, in particular, worked to refine his specialty, labor law. "I tried to bring it out of the conceptual cul-de-sac of traditional legal scholarship by focusing on its social, economic and political dimensions. Almost 40 years later, I am still trying."

Harry William Arthurs

Arthurs was president of York from 1985 to 1992. His first goal was to enhance its academic quality and reputation, or, as he put it, "to get York to believe in itself as a serious intellectual community."

Beyond that, he sought to improve its administrative and academic planning processes and to transform its generally bleak campus.

"The experience was exhilarating and productive," he recalled. "We adopted short and long-term planning and budgeting procedures. We created and carried out a campus master plan and built $190 million worth of buildings. We went up market in terms of student intake and research grants."

In addition, Arthurs lobbied governments for a fairer share of financial support, pursued donors, presided over the establishment of the Jewish studies program, and encouraged student and faculty exchanges with the Hebrew University.

As he made his way in academia, Arthurs arbitrated labor disputes in Toronto's garment district and in the federal civil service.

"It was extremely interesting work," he observed. "I ended my involvement because the learning curve flattened out a bit. I became busy with other things – scholarship and the presidency of York."

From about 1965 to 1970, Arthurs sat on the Canadian Jewish Congress' legal committee, which focused on hate propaganda.

"I felt that criminal law was not the way to address issues pertaining to the dissemination of hate and free speech," he explained. "I was concerned that precedents would be used to prosecute other people. So on principle, Congress and I parted company."

If it had been up to him, he would not have prosecuted Toronto-based neo-Nazi publicist Ernst Zundel or James Keegstra, the Alberta high school teacher who was twice convicted of willfully promoting hatred against Jews.

"I prefer social action to legal action to deal with these cases," said Arthurs, who was president of the Canadian Civil Liberties Association in 1976.

Born and raised in Toronto, he is the son of Honey, a University of Toronto grad, and Leon, a patent attorney originally from Romania.

Arthurs' maternal grandparents, Harry and Dorothy Dworkin, came to Canada from Russia and Latvia, respectively.

Harry, a travel agent, was a socialist and a Workman's Circle stalwart. "He was very active in helping the needle trade and other unions to organize." And he was a founder of Toronto's Labor Lyceum, now a Chinese restaurant.

Dorothy was an exceedingly ambitious and accomplished woman: the treasurer of the bagel bakers' union and Toronto's first professionally trained Jewish midwife and nurse.

She was also publisher of Kanada Nyes, a Yiddish-English weekly which folded in 1965 after a three-decade run, and local distributor of the Forward and the Day, Yiddish newspapers printed in New York City.

Arthurs has fond memories of Kanada Neyes. As a 12-year-old budding reporter, he published his first story in his grandmother's newspaper, covering a massive fire aboard a ship anchored in Toronto harbor.

The author of numerous learned articles and studies on the legal profession, he is acutely aware that lawyers have less than a sterling public image.

"Lawyers intervene, typically, in moments of conflict. And conflict leaves scars. Unlike physicians, who can restore you to health, lawyers can't always produce a clear-cut outcome. Client satisfaction, as a result, is not easy to come by."

Furthermore, many lawyers are closely associated with wealth and privilege, and not with the everyday grievances of the masses. Consequently, the reputation of the profession has suffered, he acknowledged.

Rabbi Rhodes steps in as Pride's new spiritual leader

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — He's only been on the job a couple of weeks, but Rabbi Robert Rhodes is already fielding requests to organize discussion groups and other types of programs.

The new spiritual leader at the Pride of Israel Synagogue stepped into the position vacated last year when Rabbi Aaron Flanzraich became spiritual leader of Beth Sholom Synagogue.

Meanwhile, Pride of Israel ritual director Steven Schonblum and Cantor Chuck Weinberg "have kept the place afloat very nicely," said Rabbi Rhodes last week.

The 40-year-old rabbi was the spiritual leader of Temple Beth El in Syracuse, N.Y., where he was involved in interfaith work, and he served as president of the Syracuse Rabbinical Council.

A native of Dublin, Ireland, Rabbi Rhodes grew up in a traditional Jewish home and attended Jewish day schools.

An interest in Jewish Studies led him to Jews' College in London, England and later to Yeshiva University in New York City, where he received a master's degree in Jewish education and administration as well as his rabbinic ordination.

There are "a good handful" of rabbis who have come from Dublin, Rabbi Rhodes said. When he was growing up, the city "easily" had a Jewish population of 6,000 and a very strong Bnei Akiva group, of which he was an active member.

Rabbi Robert Rhodes

He sees no conflict between his Orthodox background and his position at Pride of Israel, a non-affiliated synagogue with a traditional Conservative bent.

In fact, Rabbi Rhodes said, the congregation is very similar to the one he just left, which is affiliated with the Union for Traditional Judaism (of which the rabbi is a member) and was previously affiliated with the Orthodox Union.

"It's okay to acknowledge the other branches of Judaism," the rabbi said in his farewell sermon in Syracuse.

"Millions of our fellow Jews are guided in different ways by their approach to the whole system of Torah. We would like them to think and act otherwise, but it can be helpful for us to see things through their eyes once in a while. And they are our fellow Jews. We must act accordingly," he added.

Rabbi Rhodes left Syracuse, and its Jewish population of 8,000, with mixed feelings. He wasn't happy being part of the "exodus" of young observant families leaving the city. "We all cried buckets," he said.

At the same time, he is pleased to have the opportunity to serve a larger congregation (about 750 families) and to enjoy more Jewish amenities like kosher shopping and a choice of day schools. He and his wife Blima have two school-age children.

Among the programs the rabbi would like to offer his new congregants is a project of the New York-based National Jewish Outreach Program called (for use here) Read Hebrew Canada. He also looks forward to establishing learning groups for adults.

Based on congregational requests, it seems people are "eager to sit and talk about Torah subjects or current events in the light of Jewish tradition," Rabbi Rhodes said.

A Shabbat morning story-time established by his predecessor is on hiatus for the summer, but the shul's kosher food bank remains open. People use it every day, said the rabbi.

Pardes Shalom planned for community's future

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Pardes Shalom, owned by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, is the only Jewish community-owned cemetery in North America.

The far-seeing pioneers who established the cemetery feel they have made a contribution to future generations of Jews.

In 1965, developer Sid Freedman, now 70, got the idea that led to what is now a beautiful, flower-filled park that provincial government officials have said is the best managed cemetery in Ontario.

Now the location for 500 Jewish burials a year (compared with an overall total of 1,400 annual Jewish burials in the city), Pardes Shalom is expected to handle two-thirds of all Jewish burials within 10 to 15 years.

With its acquisition of 200 acres a mile north of the current site, at a cost of $4 million, it should be able to accommodate Jewish burials for 75 years to come and bring lots of revenue to the community as well.

"It will be a gold mine for the federation," said Ben Schneider, former director of the United Jewish Welfare Fund (UJWF), who has just retired as director of Toronto Hebrew Memorial Park (THMP), which operates Pardes Shalom.

The issues that will arise more and more for Pardes Shalom in the the future, according to Freedman, are the attitude of Jews to cremation, the burial of non-Jewish spouses, and the definition of what constitutes halachic burial procedure.

"Pardes Shalom will always have half of its property as parkland as long as I'm alive," said Freedman, now honorary life president of THMP. (In Hebrew the word pardes means orchard.)

A past president of Temple Sinai, Freedman was referred by Rabbi Jordan Pearlson to Schneider, who was also searching for a way to make Jewish burials less costly, while at the same time benefitting the community.

"Unattached people had no place to go," said Schneider.

There are now 2,800 to 3,000 flower beds planted at the cemetery on Dufferin Street north in Maple. Before Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur, thousands of people pay their respects to the 7,000 interred there.

Schneider says it was no simple task to get the community onside with the Pardes Shalom concept.

Ben Schneider

"At the first meeting we called, about 20 organizations showed up and there was fighting over who would get the profits from the cemetery's operation," he said.

He gives credit to the late Phil Granovsky, then president of the UJWF, for giving him quiet encouragement, and to the five organizations which advanced a loan of $25,000 each: Temple Emanu-El, Canadian Judean Benevolent Society, Adath Israel Congregation, Temple Sinai and Beth Tikvah Synagogue.

The Maple property, at Freedman's behest, was bought for $250,000. Pardes Shalom borrowed $550,000 from the Welfare Fund at the time and quickly paid back $850,000, with interest.

"He did it all by eye; it would have cost us thousands of dollars to get it done by engineers," Schneider said, referring to the way Freedman, who also bought a gravel pit for the purpose, levelled out the property, eliminated some of the hills, and left the contours needed to make it easy on the eyes.

Opposition from established cemeteries

There was opposition to the concept from established cemeteries, which were making profits on their own, and from entrepreneurs who wanted to set up in the cemetery business, he said.

But the quiet diplomacy of Freedman, Schneider and their friends won out, and today they feel the Pardes Shalom operation will eventually fill the UJA Federation coffers. The Pardes Shalom revenue already supports the Toronto Hebrew Memorial Philanthropic Fund, which distributes the money to various organizations and individuals.

The financing was so shaky at the beginning that Freedman had to buy 21 plots at $375 each to keep the cash flowing. Now a plot at Pardes Shalom sells for $1,284, including tax.

"We had opposition to our policy of selling plots to individuals and organizations at the same price and to banning resales of plots at a profit," said Schneider.

The portion of 88 acres of Pardes Shalom devoted to burials is divided into Orthodox, Conservative, Reform and community sections, with the latter proving so popular that it now represents 60 percent of the burials.

About half the 36,000 plots at Pardes Shalom are committed to specific sections, leading Freedman to believe that it will be 10 to 15 years before the new cemetery a mile north, as yet unnamed, is open for business.

Bill Draimin, president of THMP, recently wrote to Schneider, now 87, praising him. "You were my mentor, confidant and advisor," he said.

CORRECTION

The story, "Israeli highway opponents target finance company" (CJN, Aug. 5), contained some incorrect information. Environmental studies student Shai Spetgang in fact said the highway would affect 10 percent of the open spaces outside of the nature reserves and army bases. The CJN regrets the error.

Police seek leads in Toronto attack

Brith Canada's League for Human Rights – which has been documenting anti-Semitic incidents in Canada since 1982 – said the league encourages people to report hate crimes, even if they seem minor. (B'nai Brith's hotline number is 1-800-892-2624.)

"It appears that in our own community, people are reluctant to come forward unless they think it's really serious and police have no way of knowing if there is a pattern."

Canadian Jewish Congress chair Keith Landy noted that "attacks upon the elderly, and upon children, are acts of cowardice. These hate crimes should not merely offend the Canadian Jewish community, but all Canadians."

Ontario NDP leader Howard Hampton, and chair of the Canadian Race Relations Foundation Lincoln Alexander also called the attack cowardly.

Hampton called on Premier Mike Harris to "reverse his government's abandonment of anti-racism and equity initiatives." Among other complaints in an NDP news release were the Conservative government's disbanding of the anti-discrimination branch of the Ministry of Education, and deletion of violence prevention and anti-discrimination training from the new Grade 9/10 curriculum.

Alexander urged the federal government to proceed with a package of amendments to the Criminal Code – among them making possession of hate propaganda for the purpose of distribution a crime, and giving police the power to seize computer hard drives containing hate propaganda – that would toughen Canada's hate crime laws.

Jewish daytimer helps with planning

TORONTO — A new Jewish daytimer has been developed to bridge the gap between business diaries, day planners and the Jewish calendar.

Jewish environmentalist Shai Spetgang, the inventor of the Shanaton, says he wanted to find a way to integrate the Jewish calendar into a personal planning diary.

He, his brother Eli, Shanaton's layout designer and database programmer, and Rob Schaumer, marketing director, made the calendar a reality.

The calendar includes such features as Jewish holiday dates, candle lighting times for 12 cities across North America, Torah portions of the week, public and statutory holidays, and profound quotes for inspiration.

Initially, the Shanaton will be a week-at-a-glance insert, which will fit into a standard day planner binder. "Each year, we will enhance the Shanaton, based upon user comments and requests," says Schaumer.

The calendar, which retails for $16.95, is available at many Judaica stores across North America. Its Web site address is http://webhome.idirect.com/~sun18/shanaton. For more information call Schaumer at 905-669-8277

UJA Campaign 2000 Ready to Launch

With the official launch of UJA Federation's Campaign 2000 only a few days away, thousands of volunteers and supporters are eager to get started.

Even before the celebration of last year's record-breaking $40.5 million campaign subsided, UJA Federation began to plan for the second year of the Campaign for Fifty with a fundraising objective of $50 million annually by 2001.

Strengthening Jewish identity, increasing assistance for the vulnerable and rescuing Jews from danger remain the central planks of Campaign 2000, which will officially start on August 30 with a Community Launch at the Sheraton Centre Hotel.

Hundreds of volunteers have participated in programs to hear updates about worldwide Jewish needs and to help develop strategies for the upcoming campaign.

"The Young Leadership Retreat gave us tremendous insight into what needs are out there and provided us with the tools to be effective campaigners," notes David Beron, Chair of UJA Federation's Young Leadership Cabinet. "The retreat was a wonderful opportunity for me to meet people who are as deeply committed to the cause as I am," adds Lauren Cohen. "We all felt re-energized and ready to get to work."

"We're already off to a great start," notes Mike Rosenberg, who co-chairs UJA Federation's Societies Campaign with Ralph Snow. At the recent Societies Campaign kick-off, March of the Living alumni Amy Shore and Teddy Feferman thanked the group of supporters, many of whom are Holocaust survivors, for supporting the program through UJA Federation's March of the Living Endowment Fund. "Their messages were truly inspirational," said Rosenberg.

In July, more than 100 UJA Federation leaders gathered for a full-day of briefings on Jewish issues led by local and international experts.

Campaign 2000 Co-Chairs David Engel and Mel Wolfond, along with Women's Campaign Chair Carole Sterling and others, recently traveled to the former Soviet Union and Israel to see first hand how UJA Federation dollars change lives.

"Whether it's helping vulnerable Jews here in Toronto or thousands of miles away, UJA Federation covers all the needs of Jewish life," says Engel. "Now more than ever we have to be ready to respond."

Twenty-two year old Sigal Hobbey is eager to express her gratitude for being rescued by the UJA Federation funded Jewish Agency from Ethiopia 16 years ago. Next week she will be in Toronto to tell Campaign Launch participants how their support saved her family during the Jewish Agency's Operation Solomon. "I want people to know how they have changed the lives of so many Jews through their commitment to UJA Federation."

A new chapter in the history of Ethiopian Jewry is being written at this time as the Jewish Agency rescues the Jews of Quara – far removed from the country's capital of Addis Ababa. Over 1,500 Quara Jews have arrived in Israel so far, with several hundred more scheduled on flights in October.

The August 30 Campaign 2000 Launch will also feature CNN White House correspondent Wolf Blitzer and Emmy Award-winning filmmaker Simcha Jacobovici. A limited number of tickets are available by calling UJA Federation at (416) 631-5700.

Jewish Agency Sends Mission to Turkey

The Jewish Agency for Israel (JAFI) launched into action shortly after news of Turkey's devastating earthquake broke, sending a fact-finding mission to the country to determine the impact of the earthquake on the Jewish community.

The mission will assess the needs of the Jewish community and JAFI's role in providing the necessary aid to Jews affected by the quake.

Turkey's Jewish population, at 23,000, is one of the largest of any Moslem country. The great majority of Jews live in Istanbul, while Izmir has the second largest Jewish community.

UJA Federation has established a relief fund for the Turkish disaster. Please make cheques payable to UJA Federation Turkish Relief Fund and mail to: 4600 Bathurst St., Toronto, Ont. M2R 3V2.

Sigal Hobbey will continue working with Quara children while entering her second year at Hebrew University.

גידי קורן וחברים

דברים שרואים מכאן:

כחודש לפני הבחירות בישראל ביקרתי בארץ והוזמנתי על ידי אחי, דני, לטקס שבו הוא קיבל את פרס היבואן המצטיין מלשכת המסחר ישראל-ארה"ב. אורח הכבוד בטקס היה בנימין נתניהו, והוא, יחד עם שגריר ארה"ב בישראל העניקו את הפרסים. בנאום המרכזי, תיאר שגריר ארה"ב את התפתחות היחסים המסחריים בין שתי המדינות. אבל, הוא אמר, יש מעל היחסים האלה ענן כבד: ישראל היא אחת הפיראטיות הכי רציניות בעולם ו"מצטיינת" בזיוף של אלקטרוניקה, העתקת תוכנות מחשב. ושאר תכאים מסוג זה. עד כדי כך חמור העניין, אמר השגריר, שיש בארה"ב לחצים חזקים להחרים ולהעניש את ישראל. בהחלט דברים קשים. ואז עלה לדבר העילוי נתניהו. הייתי בטוח שהוא הולך להגיד שישראל עושה כל מה שביכולתה לשפר את המצב או משהו כזה. איפה! עמד שם נתניהו, זחוח ומנחך ואמר: " אחד העוזרים שלי מציע שאנחנו נשלם זכויות על אלקטרוניקה אמריקאית ברגע שהאמריקאים ישלמו זכויות על השימוש בתנ"ך, הא הא הא". הייתי המום. אני חושב שרבים בקהל, תעשיינים ואנשי עסקים- היו המומים כמוני. והנה לאחרונה בישרו הכותרות שארה"ב אכן מתכננת להחרים ולהעניש את ישראל בצורה רצינית ששוויה מאות מליוני דולאר בשנה. לא אתפלא אם שגריר ארה"ב בישראל הציע את זה לאור התנהגותו של נתניהו. בינתיים יש ממשלה חדשה, ושר המשפטים יוסי ביילין דהר לוושינגטון להתחנן ולהבטיח שהוא יחוקק חוקים חמורים ויקים משטרה מיוחדת לתפוס זייפנים. סביר להניח שממשלתו של קלינטון תיתן לישראל צ'אנס לשיפור, בעיקר לאור שאט הנפש שהיתה להם מגישתו של נתניהו. לכל מיני עניינים.

עליהום של העיתונות:

ממרחק של חמישת אלפים ק"מ, ממש מדהים איך העיתונות הכתובה והאלקטרונית בישראל מתנהגת אל ברק ואל ממשלתו. לא עברו חודשיים מאז שהוא הרכיב ממשלה במצב מאוד מסובך, וכבר מדברים עליו כנתניהו השני. ומה סה"כ הספיק האיש לעשות! חרפו אותו על שאין נשים בממשלתו - וראה זה פלא - הוא מינה שתיים. קיללו אותו שאין ייצוג ערבי בממשלתו - והפלא ופלא - יש סגן שר חוץ ערבי, וחבר כנסת ערבי ראשון בהסטוריה יושב בוועדת חוץ וביטחון. לגלגו עליו שהוא ייכנע לעראפת וסוריה תוך יום - ומסתבר שהוא תקיף וזהיר. אין מה להגיד, זוהי ארץ אוכלת יושביה. לא מפרגנים לבן אדם, והזמן היחיד שבו יש לאדם צ'אנס לשמוע דברים טובים על עצמו- זה בדברי ההספד בהלוויה שלו. רק שאז הוא כבר לא כל כך יכול לשמוע.

מטורף נאצי נכנס למרכז קהילתי בלוס אנגלס וירה בילדים יהודים, פצע אותם אנושות, ואחר כך רצח אמריקני ממוצא פיליפיני. וקראתי מישהוא שאמר שזו הסיבה מדוע כל היהודים צריכים לחיות בישראל, כי שם אין אנטישמיות. תיקון קל: בישראל נרצחים כל שנה יותר יהודים על היותם יהודים, מאשר בכל מקום אחר בעולם. כמעט כל מעשי הטרור בישראל על ידי מוסלמים קיצוניים הם אנטישמיות ברורה וגלויה. זו כמובן איננה סיבה שיהודים אינם צריכים לחיות בישראל. אבל צריך להיות מאוד זהיר בדמגוגיה של "ישראל מגינה על היהודים מפני אנטישמיות". לישראל יש צבא חזק מאוד שרוב פעולתו היא למנוע התקפה אנטישמית וזריקת יהודים לים. אבל שישאר בינינו.

Montreal rabbi visits Shanghai Jewish community

By RABBI MOISHE NEW
Special to The CJN

For reasons that are still unclear, for a brief moment my wife Nechama and I became the attraction in one of Shanghai's teeming markets. In a matter of seconds, hundreds of Chinese gathered to see "the show," as windows from the surrounding buildings flung open and hundreds more peered down into the square.

We had innocently decided to take a ride in a palanquin, a covered litter for two carried by four ceremoniously dressed Chinese men. Whilst we were borne aloft and paraded around the square, a fifth man repeatedly sounded a shofar-like instrument, blowing with all his might.

Nechama had no idea we were going to be carried. She assumed it was a kind of rickshaw and that it had wheels. The look of surprise on her face and her vocal response may, in the estimation of some, explain the reaction of the populace. Others believe that my black hat, black frock coat and full beard may have had something to do with it as well. Who knows?

When we descended, still in gales of laughter at the spectacle we had become, I turned to the crowd, and clapping my hands, indicated to them that they should join me, which they did with obvious amusement and gusto.

Fortunately, for posterity's sake, the whole incident was duly recorded on our video camera.

Our "camera-man" was Rabbi Sholom Greenberg. He, a native Israeli, together with his wife Dini who was born in Cleveland, both in their mid-20s, had arrived in Shanghai six months earlier. They had been sent, sponsored by Lubavitch World Headquarters, as Chabad emissaries to serve the local Jewish community. Together, they had already managed to create Shanghai's only active synagogue and Jewish community centre.

I had been invited on a speaking tour of Asia and Australia. Shanghai was our final destination before coming home and I had the privilege of being the guest speaker at their first Shabbaton.

The Shanghai Jewish community numbers approximately 200. Almost half this number regularly participate in the programs organized by the Greenbergs. Many of those who at present remain unaffiliated attended Yom Kippur services, if only for a short while.

Shanghai has a long Jewish history. Archeological evidence points to a Jewish presence in China as early as the eighth century, the Jews having arrived, most likely, from Persia along the Silk Road.

The Shanghai Jewish community flourished during the late 1800s and early 1900s. During the last war, thousands of Jews found refuge there, thanks to the fact that Shanghai required no entry visas and had no quota.

Today, Shanghai's 200 Jews come from all over the world, the majority from the United States. Only a small number of them have made Shanghai their permanent home. Most live there for business reasons — either their company has temporarily posted them to Shanghai, or they are establishing an import/export business. The remainder are either professors, lecturing in the local universities, or students, some of whom might spend only several months there.

Most Jews live there for business reasons

The shul and the Greenbergs' apartment are located in the Ritz Carlton Portman Hotel Complex, one of the most elegant hotels in town.

This came about in the following manner: Rabbi Mordechai Avtzon, head Chabad shaliach to China, is based in Hong Kong and is the architect of Chabad's involvement with the Jewish community in Shanghai. The Ritz Carlton Portman Hotel was built by a company in Atlanta. Knowing this, and realizing that the hotel would be an ideal location for Chabad, Rabbi Avtzon turned to my brother, Rabbi Yossi New, head Chabad shaliach to Georgia, inquiring of him as to whether he had any contacts with this company.

My brother replied that one of their chief executives, A.J. Robinson, was a member of his shul. Even more encouraging was the fact that Robinson actually oversaw the Shanghai project. Rabbi Avtzon flew to Atlanta to meet Robinson, and was able to arrange that Chabad be given an apartment and use of the hotel's recreation rooms for their shul, Shabbat dinners and programs, free of charge.

Looking at the Chabad publications, I was somewhat mystified to read in fine but clearly legible print: This program is open to non-residents only: Shalom's response only added to the mystery. "This is communist China you know," he said with a hint of a smile, and proceeded to explain.

"The day after Simchat Torah, we were visited by officers from the Chinese Internal Police and escorted to one of their head bureaus. The officials there proceeded to tell us of every event, purchase and excursion we had made since arriving in Shanghai. It seems that our Simchat Torah celebrations were the last straw.

"You see, there are only three recognized religions in China and Judaism is not one of them. So we explained to them that we were Jews and that these events were part of our religious observance. They were still not satisfied.

"The Chinese were concerned that we had come to Shanghai to proselytize. We assured them that this was not the case. Thus, it was agreed that from now on all our publications include that line..."

The Greenbergs live in the residence tower of the Ritz Carlton. Their abode however, does not exceed 400 square feet. When we walked into their apartment, Dini greeted us from her tiny kitchenette as she was preparing for the evening's Shabbaton.

Later that evening the food would be carried down three flights of stairs to the recreation room. After the meal, the leftover food and drinks, serving pieces, dishes, cutlery and glasses would be carried back up to their apartment.

We had contributed somewhat to the menu by bringing a box of chickens, a case of wine and 50 challahs from Hong Kong.

Dini explained that aside from having to prepare all their food from scratch, the fruits and vegetables have to be disinfected before consumption. All kosher products have to be imported.

The Greenbergs consider themselves lucky to be living in a place where they can at least bathe and wash using tap water. In most of Shanghai, the tap water is unsuitable even for that.

Every Friday night, the Greenbergs host a Shabbat dinner which, following services, is attended by some 25 guests. For this, their first Shabbaton, 40 people participated.

The Shabbaton was truly an international affair. We met Jews, families and singles, from the United States, Israel, Brazil, England and Canada (one young man from Cote St. Luc). One man had been living in China for 18 years and spoke the language fluently. Several men had married Chinese women.

Shabbaton was truly an international affair

My topic for Friday night was Intimacy and Sexuality in Judaism, arguably one of the reasons for the strong turnout. Rabbi Greenberg had informed me that there would probably not be a minyan on Saturday morning. The last occasion that there was a morning service with a minyan was Simchat Torah. That evening a lively discussion ensued as I endeavored to share the beauty, depth and relevance of Torah. The next morning 25 people showed up.

Shabbat was a memorable experience. We had a real farbrengen in addition to my talks, which were intense and spirited dialogues. I taught them chassidic melodies and together we toasted l'chaim. It was an outpouring of souls as we connected to one another and to God.

Particularly moving were the sentiments expressed by one young man who is married to a Chinese woman in the process of conversion. Seeing his Jewish soul stir and the inner turmoil, and questions created, was a poignant moment for all of us.

The farbrengen went on till 4 p.m., after which several people stayed on and Rabbi Greenberg studied the weekly Torah portion with them.

That evening after Shabbat, the Greenbergs were working on a Tu b'Shvat program for children, which was to take place the following day. Dini had e-mailed her sisters, all of whom are Chabad shiluchim in different parts of the world, for ideas. As a consequence, Dini had put together a multi-faceted package that was both highly entertaining and educational. Her sisters, in turn, now became the beneficiaries of the new program package.

One of Dini's sisters has been on shlichut with her husband and family in Bahia Blanca, Argentina, since the early '80s. "Before e-mail, my family would speak to them only several times a year," said Dini. "Later on, even faxing was far too costly. Now, that was sacrifice. Today, thank God, we can all keep in touch," she concluded happily.

The next morning, flying back home, Nechama and I mulled over our visit. We do not know the extent to which, if at all, I had affected my listeners over the course of the Shabbaton. We do know how deeply moved we were.

The people we had met, the soul connection that we had felt, and the stories of the spiritual journeys that we had heard – all of this touched and inspired us. This is the experience though of every Chabad shaliach everywhere. After all, this is what Chabad is all about – reaching out to fellow Jews. Beyond the labels and the affiliations or the lack thereof. And yes, it was especially inspiring to see Jews in Shanghai discover their Jewish roots and grow in their study of and commitment to Judaism. One young couple with two children had recently begun to observe Shabbat and kashruth.

But it was the shiluchim themselves, Sholom and Dini, who had had the greatest impact on us. To have seen firsthand their self-sacrifice, both physical and spiritual and, notwithstanding this, their attitude of joy and privilege of being Chabad emissaries, carrying out the Rebbe's work – this memory is their lasting gift to us.

Ottawa couple mark 60th by donating ambulance

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Joseph and Betty Feller recently celebrated their 60th wedding anniversary by donating an ambulance to Magen David Adom.

They made the presentation in Israel at the organization's headquarters in Ramat Gan.

The Fellers celebrated their 50th wedding anniversary by gathering their family in Israel, as well. "At that particular time," said Joseph, "I began to think about donating an ambulance."

The Fellers have been active in the local Jewish community and ardent supporters of Israel. "When I approached my wife and told her what I wanted to do, she said of all the things I have done, this is probably the most important," said Joseph.

Having noted the shortage of ambulances in Israel and the fact that many are old and need to be replaced, he considered the gift a priority.

Joseph credits Sam Litwack, the Ottawa representative of Magen David Adom, for facilitating the arrangements for the gift, liaising with the Canadian and Israeli representatives to co-ordinate the presentation.

The presentation took place on June 20 with the Fellers, their children and family members from Russia, Romania and Hawaii in attendance.

From left: Betty and Joseph Feller, Donna Lee Kauffman, W. Ian Feller and Connie Gail Salomon.

Wendy Kauffman Treitel, the Fellers' granddaughter who works for CTV in Israel, provided "a delicious cake, an exact replica of our ambulance, with lights and actual photographs of Bubbie and Zayde in the front seat" said Feller.

"I can't tell you how touching it was when we walked up to the building in Ramat Gan and saw our names on the ambulance," said Feller. He and his wife were proud to learn that their children had donated additional apparatus for the ambulance to honor their parents.

"When this ambulance saves one life," said Feller, "it will have paid for itself."

Now's the time to decide, says Sam

Reform camp culmination of a dream

These young campers and their counsellors are taking part in a processional to the Sabbath eve services.

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

PARRY SOUND — The young people at Canada's first Reform summer camp are doing their part to fulfil the responsibility of tikkun olam (healing the world).

At Camp George, some campers were recently off painting the outside of a rebuilt Catholic church at Shawanaga First Nation Reserve, 32 kilometres away. Others were grooming and bathing animals at the Parry Sound Humane Society and working at different good neighbor projects.

Tikkun olam is an essential part of Camp George, as are the daily tfillot (prayers) led by the campers and one-hour shiurim (study periods).

This beautiful 250-acre site on Maple Lake, 20 kilometres from Parry Sound, is the former resort and camp property owned by the Jewish Camp Council and purchased by Camp George for $1.6 million.

A $500,000 upgrading has turned the camp into a summer jewel with state of the art facilities, where 275 campers (175 in the first session, 100 in the second) enjoyed swimming, canoeing, sailing, water skiing, surfboarding, mountain biking, wall climbing and manoeuvring their way though a rope course that cost $55,000 to install and which has the fun of bungee jumping, but is a lot safer.

Camp George is the culmination of 15 years of dreaming and planning by leaders of the Reform movement. A major impetus came from Sam Riseman of Toronto whose lead gift of $100,000 a year for 10 years helped set things on their way.

The camp is named after his late father, George Riseman who died in 1993 at age 70.

In the main camp square, a dedication board in memory of Riseman carries the heading: "Be Good to Each Other."

A plaque also thanks UJA Federation of Toronto for its contribution.

Camp George is the first of 11 Reform summer camps in North American to be located right on a lake, and it is the first such camp to be kosher.

"The Reform membership in Canada is much more conservative than in the United States and we wanted the camp to be open to everyone who wanted to come," said camp director Jack Feldman, 41, a Toronto native, explaining the decision to get the kosher designation.

In fact, a few of the campers came because it was kosher, he said.

The camp's own rabbis (it has a faculty of 18 rabbis and educators) supervise kashrut.

Feldman's face lights up when he says that Camp George's fees at $1,725 for three weeks and $3,100 for six weeks are lower than those at private camps ($2,600 to $2,900 for 3½ weeks, he said) and that many of the campers are aided by scholarships from their own congregations or the camp.

"Our goal is that no Jewish child will be denied a camp outing because of a lack of money," Feldman said.

This camper is climbing the new rope course.

There are no parents' visiting days at Camp George, because it disrupts the schedule and is hard on the parents and the kids, he said.

Since it was the first season, however, about half the parents drove their children to camp to see the grounds for themselves, and they were encouraged to do so, he said.

Twenty-four Reform congregations, the Union of American Hebrew Congregations (the central body of Reform Jewry in North America) and the Canadian Council of Reform Judaism, all combined to make Camp George a reality.

Plans are underway for the development of its 198 unused acres go ahead. For starters, eight new cabins at a cost of $225,000 will be built next year, the beginning of a three-year program which proposes to build eight new cabins each year to bring the camp's enrolment to 325.

A waterproof Aron Kodesh for the rebuilt chapel is also planned.

The site will continue to be rented to other organizations when the camping season ends Aug. 15, and it is used as a retreat by some Reform congregations and by York University, B'nai Brith and Bialik school.

For information about Camp George, phone 905-760-1482 or fax 905-760-1484.

Camp George is nestled 25 kilometres from Parry Sound.

The rope course is said to be safer than bungee jumping.

Police make arrest after break-in at Bobov centre

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A 37-year-old man was to appear in court Aug. 23 following a break-in at Congregation Chassidei Bobov, on Bathurst Street north of Carmichael Avenue.

Raphael Yelin, of no fixed address, was charged with break, enter and theft. He was arrested early Monday after a Carmichael Avenue resident alerted police that a man had entered the Bobov building through a classroom window around 11:50 p.m. Sunday night.

The suspect was arrested as he was leaving the building, Det.-Sgt. Jim Sproxton of Metropolitan Toronto Police, 32 division, told The CJN.

Nothing appears to have been broken and there was no indication that anyone else was involved in the incident, said Sproxton.

About $80 in cash was stolen, and later recovered, he added.

A Bobov representative, who asked not to be named, said the suspect was known to people at the synagogue, which also houses a school, and had been on the premises more than once, seeking charity.

He also said a pushke was left open following the break-in.

Winnipeg police charge five in cemetery desecration

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Winnipeg police have charged five individuals with mischief over $5,000 as a result of the worst desecration of a Jewish cemetery here in memory.

All indications are that the attack on the the 90-year-old Hebrew Sick Benefit Association Cemetery in the early morning hours of Tuesday, August 10, was a senseless crime of convenience rather than an act of anti-Semitism.

The individuals charged, Shawna Lehr and Chris Diamond, both 18, Russel Martens and Clayton Parker, both 21, and a 15-year-old, were having a party at Lehr's home near the north Winnipeg cemetery. The party, police believed involved alcohol and drugs. The Winnipeg police hate crimes unit is still investigating and hasn't entirely ruled out anti-Semitic motives.

The vandals however left no anti-Jewish graffiti nor issued any statements.

In their spree, the vandals overturned or uprooted close to 300 headstones. The damage is estimated to be over $100,000. The cemetery committee and synagogue will pay for repair of damaged stones if there are no surviving relatives. For the other stones, the families will have to pay, although Beth Israel acting executive director Estelle Raber reports that there have been several calls to the office from other community organizations offering some financial support.

As well, Yehudi Kinar, Israel's consul-general to Toronto and Western Canada was scheduled to visit the cemetery on Monday, August 23 to convey the sympathy and concern of the Israeli government.

Round-the-clock security has been put in place at the cemetery and the police have increased their surveillance of this and the other Jewish cemeteries in the city. Security has also been tightened at other Jewish institutions in the city.

OKANAGAN GOLF TOURNEY

The Okanagan Jewish community recently hosted its second annual golf tournament with 92 golfers participating from across Canada and the United States. The weekend included a reception Friday evening, followed by a Saturday morning Shabbat service at the Okanagan Jewish Community Centre Chapel. Prizes were handed out to the first eight teams competing. The proceeds from this event are targeted for the Jewish education of the children of the Okanagan Jewish community. Predator Ridge, where the tournament was held, has invited the Okanagan Jewish Community's Golf Tournament back for a third year on July 15-17, 2000.

Scene in Ottawa

By G.K. SIMCOE

I was asked to forward this to your attention: The natural governing party of Canada just wrapped up its national caucus meetings in Halifax.

In policy terms, nobody won (tax cuts versus new social spending) and nobody lost. In fact, on the surface, it appeared to be one big yawn. But people have been known to talk in their sleep, so here goes with some choice bits of wit and wisdom from the participants.

On the cabinet shuffle: "The Prime Minister should remember that the leadership race took place a decade ago...and he won!"

On the ministers unceremoniously dumped from the cabinet: "But they promised me that I would be protected!"

On ministerial wannabes: "I don't understand it. I'm Italian, I didn't support Martin and I've been around here way longer than what's-her-name..."

On the Prime Minister's Office (PMO) staff (I): "I really wish a few of them would be shuffled out..."

On PMO staff (II): "If that's a formal motion I'll second that."

On opposition to the government: "Can't Preston do anything right?"

Dear Readers:

These genuine snippets from the mouths of various MPs may seem disjointed. And to some of you who may not understand the full context, even a bit confusing. But they reflect something very serious and the prime minister would do well to pay close attention.

There is mutiny in the ranks. Liberals are profoundly discouraged and offended by the arrogance exhibited by Chrétien and those around him. Look no further than the glib manner in which the prime minister assured journalists that he would sign Paul Martin's nomination papers if Martin chooses to run again.

The subtext was clear to all: "I am in charge; there is nothing anyone can do without my approval; and I alone will dictate the Liberal party script for as long as I choose."

The image of the "little guy from Shawinigan" has taken a number of hits over the past 18 months. This one will leave a bruise – at least within the rank and file of the Liberal party.

Put differently by yet another passive participant in the Halifax meeting: "Obviously our leader has confused himself with someone else with the same initials!"

Israel preparing for terrorist acts in 2000: expert

By WENDY GOLDBLATT SCHNEIDER
Special to The CJN

HAMILTON — Israeli authorities are maintaining a high state of vigilance as they prepare themselves for expected terrorist incidents in 2000, says a leading Israeli expert on disaster management.

Jay Levinson, a former CIA employee who made aliyah from the United States in the early 1980s, said that there are many groups in the country that pose a threat to public safety.

He was among the presenters at the ninth World Conference on Disaster Management, held here last month.

Levinson, a training officer for the Israeli police in the division of forensic science, said that experts are predicting that the Church of the Holy Sepulchre, which Christian tradition ascribes as the site of the crucifixion, will be a likely target of extreme messianic sects.

The leader of one particular sect, said Levinson, who was urging his followers to come to Jerusalem to commit mass suicide, was apprehended last year and deported.

Police are concerned, he said, with maintaining good community relations with the various religious communities that inhabit Jerusalem's old city.

The ministries of religion and tourism are also involved in preparing for the expected onslaught of tourists during the millennium.

In addition to his domestic responsibilities, Levinson has been summoned abroad on a number of occasions to oversee the identification of Israeli and Jewish victims of aircraft disasters.

After last year's Swissair disaster, the Union of Orthodox Jewish congregations from New York sent him to Halifax to help identify one of their members.

When an employee of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs and a nephew of Shimon Peres were killed in an airplane crash in Nepal, Levinson flew into Bangkok to get sufficient evidence that enabled a religious court in Jerusalem to release their wives to remarry.

Much of his work involves obtaining information about the deceased from their families, and comparing it with evidence found at the crash scene.

An Orthodox Jew, his investigative practices conform to the requirements of Halachah. While Halachah allows fingerprints and dental work as permissible means of identification, a person cannot be identified based on a seat assignment or by business cards bearing his or her name that were found in a pocket.

In the Nepal incident, a credit card and checkbook were recovered, but there were no human remains that could be associated with the two victims.

Levinson was able to retrieve the boarding passes and get testimony from a variety of sources that said there were no intermediate stops, that no one could possibly have survived the crash given the physics of the impact, and that even if someone had survived, he could not have survived the elements of the area. The victim's wives were subsequently released to remarry.

Levinson said that haredi volunteers who often appear on the scene of terrorist attacks in Israel, play a vital role. They are police-registered volunteers, he said, who move in after personnel have completed the task of victim identification, to clean up the site.

According to Halachah, every remains of a person must be buried, including the blood.

"It's not a police function to clean up the scene in these terms," said Levinson. "In the past, there were cases where the blood was washed down. It's unacceptable halachically, and I'm proud to say that today it is absolutely not done."

Levinson said he knows of no other country that has such a group of volunteers, and that the volunteers have also received acclaim from all segments of Israeli society.

"To their credit, [the volunteers] make absolutely no distinction if the person is religious, non religious or a non-Jew."

Shul sponsors Kosovo family

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — It was a hectic couple of weeks, but Murray Knazen, chair of the Shaarey Zedek Synagogue's tikkun olam committee, feels it was well worth it.

Earlier this summer, in response to an appeal from Evelyn Hecht, director of community relations for the Winnipeg Jewish Community Council, the tikkun olam committee of Winnipeg's largest synagogue volunteered to sponsor a refugee family from Kosovo. About a dozen synagogue members pitched in to help.

"We thought that we had a month to get ready," Knazen says. "It turned out that we had just five days. The government decided to close the refugee camps."

The Bytyqi family, who has since returned to Kosovo because their mother is ill, consisted of a husband and wife, three young children and two nephews.

They had been housed in a refugee camp in New Brunswick. The government flew them into Winnipeg on July 27 and put them up in a village south of the city.

With the help of the Jewish Child and Family Service (JC&FS) and Rina Roytburg, the JC&FS Russian translator – she speaks some Serbian also – the Shaarey Zedek volunteers swung into action. They filed the necessary papers, found apartments for the family, and took them shopping for basic supplies.

They also arranged dental and medical appointments, English classes and schooling for the children.

With a trial run behind them though, the Shaarey Zedek tikkun olam committee has let it be known that they are ready to take on another refugee family should the need arise.

McGill student completes year in Ghana

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Now that Aden Seaton is back in Canada, she can enjoy being anonymous.

The 22-year-old native of Perth, Ont., recently returned home after a year in Ghana, where she volunteered on a farm for eight months, germinating cashews, citrus fruits and mango.

She also learned to balance a basket on her head, pound starchy food into "fufu" (eaten with puréed soup for a traditional Ghanaian dinner), and to communicate basic ideas in the Twi language.

As the only white person on the farm, she was the constant centre of attention.

Although the interest was benevolent, "it became a huge expenditure of energy all the time to interact with people," Seaton said recently at her grandparents' Toronto home.

"One thing I missed was effortless friendships."

Her Christian friends in Ghana "really were concerned" because she is Jewish. "I had people tell me they believe they're going to heaven, and they want me to be with them," she said.

"In the western culture, we tiptoe around religious subjects, and very common things in Ghana, here, would be considered outrageous. It's perfectly acceptable for someone to get on your car and start reciting from the Bible."

An anthropology and religious studies major, Seaton spent two years at the University of King's College in Halifax. Last year, she transferred her credits to McGill University, where she is about to resume her studies.

Seaton's day-to-day experiences in Ghana provided fascinating reading for her family and friends back home, as well as for readers of the Perth Courier, where she had an article published earlier this year.

Originally, she had considered teaching English in Africa while she took a year off school.

But when she heard by chance about Willing Workers on Organic Farms, an international organization providing room and board to foreign volunteers in exchange for labor, she changed her plans.

Seaton's appetite for adventure had been whetted reading "incredible" letters from a family friend spending time in Ghana.

"I'd never heard anything bad about Ghana," said Seaton of the West African nation. "All I heard was how friendly and hospitable, how nice, the people were – and it's also peaceful."

Seaton's parents, Joni Seligman and Jack Seaton, were completely supportive of her plans. "I was very excited for her," said her father, although he admitted to worrying a bit when weeks would go by without mail.

Mankwadaf Farm, where Seaton was based, was about 90 minutes from the nearest phone or post office, and lacked electricity.

Her work day began at 6:30 a.m. and ended before noon, when the heat became oppressive.

Sometimes in the afternoon Seaton would help cook dinner, having struck up a friendship with the cook, a woman her own age named Monica.

For a weekend visit to Monica's home in Kumasi, over two hours away, Seaton arose at 3 a.m. to catch a tro-tro (public transportation) to the city.

In Kumasi, Ghana's second-largest city, Seaton found she was "a minor roadside attraction, even at 6:30 in the morning," she wrote. "I try to have a sense of humor about the whole situation."

Seaton said she hasn't found it difficult to re-adjust to being in Canada, because she spent a month in Israel before returning home.

Being in a developed country again proved to be "a tough transition."

She found it "a little troubling" to see a large hotel in Eilat, each room furnished with a flush toilet, whereas in Ghana, villagers walk for over two hours to collect water, and wait another 2½ hours for one bucketful.

"There's a completely different set of problems [in Israel]," Seaton said. "It took a little while for my mind to shift from the problems in Ghana to the problems people are facing in Israel.

"You can tell the difference between a place that has peace and one that doesn't. People in Ghana are very aware that they're free, and proud to be Ghanaian. They laugh a lot more than they would if they live in Israel."

Ghanaians don't have our amenities, Seaton noted. "But they certainly have peace of mind, and a lot of that comes from their very strong faith."

Concordia names Jewish studies chair

MONTREAL — Concordia University's faculty of arts and science has appointed Norman Ravvin as the first chair in Quebec and Canadian Jewish studies.

A native of Calgary, Ravvin joins Concordia's department of religion from the University of New Brunswick where he taught in the English department. He has an extensive background in Jewish studies, focused primarily on Jewish literature and literature of the Holocaust.

He has published a book, House of Words, which deals with Canadian Jewish literature, and is currently at work on a second book, The Hidden Canada, which will include chapters on the Jewish farming colonies of the Prairies.

In addition to his teaching and research duties, Ravvin will be responsible for outreach, with particular attention paid to Montreal's Jewish community.

"The field of Canadian Jewish studies is just emerging into prominence, as students and scholars seek to explore the Jewish community's 300-year history in Canada. While Judaic studies have long been a strength at Concordia's religion department, the push to create a chair in Canadian Jewish studies was given a big boost with a recent grant from the Canadian government, under the aegis of its multicultural program," said Leslie Orr, chair of the department.

Last year, an Institute for Canadian Jewish Studies was established at the university with a grant from Andrea and Charles Bronfman and the Seagram Co. Ltd. The Institute provides fellowships to master's and PhD students exploring Canadian Jewish topics.

The religion department currently offers a wide variety of courses, looking at the social, political and cultural aspects of religion. In addition to a strong Judaic stream, the department focuses on the comparative aspect of religion and offers a series of courses looking at the role of women in religion.

Israeli girl recovering after dramatic rescue

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — In a rescue operation that defied shrinking odds, Israeli rescue teams have saved a 9-year-old girl who had been trapped for four days in earthquake rubble in Turkey.

Doctors said Shiran Franco was dehydrated but in good condition when they reached her early last Saturday morning. Her mother, Iris, who was rescued from the ruins the previous Thursday, said the first thing her daughter asked for was a soft drink. Shiran also asked her mother why it had taken so long to reach her.

"They worked very hard," Iris Franco responded.

On Saturday, Israeli teams also recovered the bodies of Shiran's twin brother, her father and her grandparents. The bodies of another Israeli couple who had been vacationing in the resort town of Cinarcik were also found.

Rescue units reached Shiran around 4 a.m. on Saturday morning in the wreckage of an apartment building where she had been staying with her family.

Maj. Eran Magen, who first spotted Shiran, said he decided to drill a hole in what he believed was the room in which the children had been sleeping.

"I drilled a hole and looked inside, and thought I saw a hand," Magen said. "I yelled down, and I think was answered. I ordered everyone to turn off the [drilling] equipment. From there, everything started moving quickly."

The reunited mother and daughter were flown to Israel on Saturday, where the girl was hospitalized at Sheba hospital in Tel Hashomer.

Doctors marvelled at her condition in light of the circumstances. They said she would remain hospitalized until she was fully rehydrated, and until doctors could determine whether there is damage to internal organs or muscles.

Family members said Shiran has no recollection of the earthquake. Iris Franco said her daughter thought she had been in a car accident.

Israeli aid efforts, including a field hospital, continue to operate in Turkey. Some of the several tons of food, clothing and blankets collected in Israel for the earthquake victims were due to be sent to Turkey on Monday.

Group has saved nine lives

By AMOS HAREL
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

GULACUK, Turkey — Israeli rescue teams will continue working in the Turkish towns of Cinarcik and Gulacuk despite the Turkish government's declaration that there are no chances of finding any more survivors in the earthquake rubble.

After the Turkish government made this announcement Sunday, an Israeli team, assisted by Bulgarian and Turkish teams, rescued a Turkish woman from under a destroyed building in Cinarcik, not far from where the Israeli team had rescued Shiran Franco, a nine-year-old girl, on Saturday. The 50-year-old woman was taken by helicopter to the nearest hospital.

Until now, the delegation of the IDF home front command has rescued nine people who survived the quake and has pulled 132 bodies out from the rubble.

On Sunday Col. Shalom Ben-Aryeh, commander of the IDF's rescue mission training school, who is in Turkey with the mission, said there were still chances of saving lives. He said experience from the earthquake in Armenia proved that survivors could still be found even after eight days.

Ben-Aryeh estimated that the team would start returning to Israel within several days. The team will gradually reduce its numbers, leaving mainly medical personnel to help treat the injured and fight epidemics.

The IDF's rescue forces in Turkey are made up of 385 people, who arrived in three teams. The medical delegation in the city of Adapazari, which was severely damaged in the quake, has reactivated the city's hospital.

A delegation of about 100 doctors and medical workers established the largest field hospital in the area, with about 100 beds, in the hospital's yard.

"The Israelis resumed the activities of the operating room inside the hospital, and 10 operations are being held there a day," said Dr. Giora Martinovitch, a delegation member.

He added that a tent was erected for each ward, and said the field hospital is equipped with the most efficient communications centre.

Memorial held for victims of road accidents in Israel

This photo shows some of the several hundred people who demonstrated last week in Tel Aviv to protest the terrible toll of accidents on Israel's roads. In the last two weeks alone, 36 people have been killed in road accidents. [Israel photo]

By VIVA PRESS
CJN Israel Bureau

JERUSALEM — "Don't let the summer kill you on the roads," a jingle put out by Israel's Road Safety Authority, has been dominating the airwaves during recent months.

But it doesn't seem to be working. In the past two weeks alone, there have been more than 25 people killed on the country's roads. And that seems to be the new norm.

Every day, newspapers here run headlines similar to "One killed, three injured on roads," or "Seven killed on roads over the weekend." There are more than 500 deaths each year on Israel's roads.

Thousands more people are maimed, paralyzed and crippled. Such numbers prompted Nurit Grossman, whose son Gal was killed in a car accident in 1996, to start the road-safety advocacy group, Anashim Be'adom (People in Red). Anashim Be'adom is one of over a dozen organizations that took part in the August 17 Memorial Day for Traffic Victims – its first time being marked in Israel.

The first such memorial day was organized in 1992 in England by a group called Road Peace. Since then, groups in other European countries have held ceremonies on August 17, believed to be the day in 1896 that Bridget Driscoll became the first person to die in a car accident.

"We want to pass on the message that we must end the slaughter on the roads and [prevent] additional accidents," said Tzippy Newman, an Anashim Be'adom member.

Last week in Tel Aviv, pedestrians and bicyclists participated in a candle-lit procession from the train station to Kikar Rabin to commemorate those killed on the country's roads. In Jerusalem, an all-night vigil memorializing victims was held at Kikar Safra, outside City Hall.

Anashim Be'adom sponsors road safety education programs at community centres, demonstrates whenever traffic accidents occur, and lobbies Knesset members to legislate more effective punishments for traffic offenders, Grossman said.

But Yakov Ganot, head of the National Road Safety Authority, said all of the recent accidents were caused by human error and therefore "police enforcement" won't help. Unlike on Canada's highways, where one knows that speed cameras are installed, Israeli drivers know that there are no speed cameras, and the likelihood of being pulled over for speeding really isn't a factor.

Only when the government imposed a NIS 750 fine for talking on the phone while driving, did Israelis take note. Before the fine, people ignored the many costly advertisements declaring it unsafe to drive while talking on the phone.

Still, the National Road Safety Authority (RSA) thinks advertisements calling for safer driving will help overcome the high rates of accidents on the roads. The radio jingles call for people to drink lots of water to fend off dehydration, to pull over when they feel tired, and to have patience when in a traffic jam.

Shmuel Hershkovitz, director-general of the RSA, didn't take part in the memorial day. "The authority does not get involved in commemorations; we deal with prevention and saving lives," he said. "Gimmicks won't help lower the number of deaths on the roads." But Anashim Be'Adom, who looks to the North American group Mothers Against Drunk Driving for inspiration, thinks physical awareness of the problem – rather than just advertisements – is the first step to overcoming the high road-death rates plaguing Israelis today. That's why they helped sponsor the memorial day, which they hope will become an annual commemoration in Israel.

Since the beginning of the year, 309 people have died in 13,186 traffic accidents.

The Week in Israel

Aug. 16

• Two bombs that exploded in Netanya on Sunday may have been dropped by terrorists fleeing after being approached by police. There were no injuries in the explosions.

• According to media reports, Iranian intelligence recently transferred some $5 million (US) to Hamas to fund terrorist attacks on Israeli targets. The money, first in a series of monthly payments, was reportedly paid into the accounts of Hamas officials in Jordan in late July.

Aug. 17

• President Ezer Weizman phoned Turkish President Suleyman Demirel to express his condolences in the wake of the earthquake that struck Turkey. Israel mobilized to send supplies and rescuers to Turkey.

Aug. 18

• Border police defused three explosives discovered near the joint Israeli-Palestinian liaison offices north of Ramallah. The attempted bombings were the latest in what was seen by security officials as an increase in terrorist activities in the past two weeks.

Aug. 19

• Israeli and Palestinian talks on the implementation of the Wye accords collapsed over differences on the release of Palestinian prisoners. But no one called the situation a crisis.

• Israel is having contact with Syria via an unnamed Arab country, according to Israeli Deputy Foreign Minister Nawaf Masalha.

Aug. 20

• Prime Minister Ehud Barak voiced support for a project to offer Diaspora youth free first-time, 10-day trips to Israel. Barak will decide over the next month whether to uphold Benjamin Netanyahu's promise to contribute $100 million over the next five years to the Birthright Israel initiative by the Bronfman and Steinhardt groups in North America. The first group of 6,000 students is expected to come to Israel this winter as part of the program, half of whom will arrive on trips organized by Hillel.

Progress possible for 13 Iranians

Earlier this summer, rallies on behalf of the detainees took place in Toronto, Montreal, Ottawa, Winnipeg and Vancouver.

Canada has informed Iran that "any adverse outcome" in the matter "would have serious consequences, not only with Canada's relations with Iran, but with all members of the international community," Foreign Affairs spokesperson Valerie Noftle told The CJN on Friday.

Ottawa "has made clear that the plight of these persons tops our agenda, but it is inconceivable to steer a course of normalization of relations until there is a resolution," Noftle added.

In June, Axworthy called in senior Iranian officials for an explanation, saying Canada was "disturbed" by the arrests. Canada also sought clarification from its embassy in Tehran.

Ottawa said it received assurances that the accused would receive fair treatment and due process under Iranian law.

The treatment of the accused has reportedly improved considerably since their arrest. They have been allowed family visits and kosher food, according to reports.

There were conflicting reports last week that the trial of the 13 was due to begin. An American Jewish leader stated that formal charges against them "will be brought on Thursday, [Aug. 19]."

The U.S. State Department last week urged Tehran to release the Jews. Spokesperson James Rubin said that to date, none of the 13 has had access to counsel.

He reaffirmed that none was involved in spying for the United States. Israel and Washington earlier said there was no truth to the allegation that any of the detainees had ever spied for the Jewish state.

Ronen said the French and German governments have been especially helpful in talks with Iran.

Iran has said the matter of the 13 Jews is a domestic affair.

The country has reportedly executed 17 Jews on espionage charges in the past 20 years, including two in 1997.

KILLED IN LEBANON, BURIED IN ISRAEL

A soldier is comforted by friends as he kneels beside the flower-covered grave of his comrade Sgt. Doron Hershkovitz at the funeral for the 20-year-old infantry soldier last week. Hershkovitz and Eyal Gueta, 21, both from the Golani Brigade, were killed in a firefight with the Hezbollah in south Lebanon. A third soldier was seriously wounded. Thirteen IDF soldiers have been killed in Lebanon this year. Israel's Prime Minister Ehud Barak repeated his commitment to pull the IDF out of Lebanon by June 2000. [RNS/ Reuters photo]

Russian elections and 'the Jews'

By ELIYAHU SALPETER
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Concern is growing among the Jews of Russia that they will become an issue in the political battles expected ahead of the December elections for the Russian Parliament, and next year's presidential race.

Already, there are signs that President Boris Yeltsin's opposition, coming mainly from the nationalistic circles, will attempt to take advantage of the close contacts between Yeltsin's family and several Jewish millionaires, in order to arouse anti-Semitic sentiment.

Such a strategy is clearly visible in the Russian press. Former prime minister Victor Chernomyrdin, for example, was quoted earlier this month as saying, in reaction to the confrontation between media tycoons Boris Berezovsky and Vladimir Gusinski, "Apparently two Jews had a fight – and the whole country must witness this farce."

Rabbi Isaak Kogan walks with members of the Federal Security Service and his 12-year-old son, Josef, who found a bomb outside their synagogue in Moscow on July 25. [RNS/Reuters photos]

The popular nationalist extremist newspaper Zavtra, which habitually denies that the Holocaust took place, praised Chernomyrdin's statement. The prestigious economic daily Komersant noted that the comment was a signal of an impending "anti-Semitic plague."

Moscow's chief rabbi, Pinhas Goldschmidt, also predicts that "the Jewish issue will play prominently in the election campaign, whether we like it or not," and accuses the authorities of "not properly responding to the violent wave of anti-Semitism."

But Pavel Feldblum, a leader of the city's Jewish community, said in a recent interview with the Jewish Telegraphic Agency's Moscow reporter, that "there isn't much chance for a call [from the Jews] that the government should guarantee order and stability in the country, when there is no order and stability in the government itself."

Russian Jews are found on different sides of the political battle lines. On the one hand, it is no secret in Moscow that Jewish millionaires have business contacts with Yeltsin, his family and close associates, and that those same millionaires fear Yeltsin's rivals' victory in the upcoming elections.

Gennady Zyuganov, Communist leader

On the other hand, the president's rivals encompass a wide spectrum – including anti-Semites, fascists, communists and liberals. Thus, for example, Moscow Mayor Yuri Luzhkov, among those mentioned as possible rivals to Yeltsin's presidential candidate, attended the prayer service organized several weeks ago to give thanks for the failure of an attempted bomb attack on Chabad's Bolshaya Bronnaya synagogue.

Luzhkov told the crowd gathered at the event that he was flattered by the (mistaken) claim, made by extremist nationalist circles, that he was of Jewish descent. He came to the synagogue without advance notice, however, thus preventing the media from covering his visit. In addition, Luzhkov recently joined forces with former Prime Minister Yevgeny Primakov, who is known for being pro-Arab and who is not considered a big fan of the Jews.

Yeltsin's decision to fire Prime Minister Sergei Stepashin and appoint KGB veteran Vladimir Putin in his stead has increased feelings of insecurity among Russia's Jews.

Because of his past, Putin raises instinctive fears. Despite Yeltsin's backing, however, public-opinion polls show that Putin's chances of becoming Russia's next president are close to nil. In his last position, Putin served, among other things, as chair of the presidential committee on combating extremism, and he dealt with anti-Semitism, neo-Nazism and racism in that capacity.

He met several times with the heads of the Jewish community, mostly talking with them about security arrangements for safeguarding Jewish institutions. According to participants in those meetings, Putin "was sympathetic" to the issue, but there is no record of any public statement he has made on Jewish matters.

On other issues, Putin has acted fiercely against scientists and environmentalists who publicly condemned the government's transgressions in these fields – a fact that does not point to much tolerance on his part. On the other hand, in the early 1990s Putin helped local democratic officials in St. Petersburg prevent a takeover by the communists.

Vladimir Putin

But even in St. Petersburg, which views itself as Russia's "intellectual capital," tolerance is not shared by all. On a popular local television interview show, viewers were recently asked whether they would take part personally in carrying out an "ethnic cleansing."

There are 250,000 to 500,000 "foreigners" – Jews and other non-Slavs, in other words – in St. Petersburg. Forty-three percent of the participants in the survey answered affirmatively.

Even if one takes into account that the interviewer, and presumably many of his viewers as well, belong to the right wing's camp, the results are still surprising and frightening.

No less horrific is the fact that such a "survey" was conducted and aired on a television channel jointly owned by the St. Petersburg municipality and Balt Unexim Bank, one of the main sponsors of regional Governor Vladimir Yakovlev's election campaign.

The Russian Jewish Congress recently listed three main factors explaining the rise in anti-Semitic incidents in Russia: the growing number of politicians issuing anti-Semitic statements to win popularity; the Russian public's indifference to attacks on minorities; and the authorities' helplessness, "not wanting or not able" to prosecute those guilty of incitement and racism. The Congress's conclusion gives pause: "This attitude raises the question of whether Jews will be able to remain on Russian land."

Clinton promises to fight anti-Semitism

By DANIEL KURTZMAN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

WASHINGTON — President Bill Clinton is promising American Jewish leaders that he'll use his bully pulpit to denounce anti- Semitism.

With the specter of the shooting spree at a Los Angeles-area Jewish community centre hanging overhead, Clinton and roughly 30 Jewish leaders recently held a 90-minute free-for-all discussion originally set up to discuss the future of the Mideast peace process.

The Aug. 12 session at the White House, instead, focused largely on the recent spate of anti-Semitic attacks and possible legislative responses.

At the urging of the leaders, Clinton pledged to use his office to speak out forcefully against anti-Semitism and racism and to push Congress to enact stricter laws to combat hate crimes and control guns.

He did not sound upbeat, however, about the prospects for passing new gun control measures. One Jewish leader who attended the meeting said Clinton was "outraged by the unwillingness of the House to do anything about guns."

Not optimistic on gun control

The president made his own appeal to Jewish leaders, urging them to come together with other minority groups in a united front against anti-Semitism, racism and bigotry.

Following the meeting, many of the leaders said they came away believing Clinton was firmly and passionately committed to stamping out hate violence.

"He was empathizing with us,"said Rabbi Eric Yoffie, president of the Union of American Hebrew Congregations. "He was feeling our pain.

"We really look to him to rally the nation, to arouse its moral conscience," Rabbi Yoffie added. "That's the task of the president, so this doesn't get lost in the headlines in a day or two."

On the Middle East front, Clinton said he was optimistic that Israel and the Palestinians will resolve differences in the coming weeks on implementing the Wye accord. He also said he was hopeful that Congress will approve the $1.2 billion in special aid for Israel, and $400 million for the Palestinians that Clinton promised in return for implementation of the Wye agreement. The money has not yet been included in foreign aid legislation.

Battle for Jerusalem fought slowly before final talks

By GIL SEDAN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Tensions ran high here three weeks ago Friday.

According to Israeli intelligence reports, radical Muslims intended to stir up trouble during their noon prayers following an Israeli decision to seal off a window the Palestinians had carved out in the southern wall of the Old City.

Opinion

Police did not take any chances. A large number of officers were deployed around the Temple Mount to prevent a possible outburst. Potential troublemakers got the message, the majority of worshippers went home quietly and another mine had been removed in the battle over Jerusalem.

Although Israel and the Palestinians agreed to leave the sensitive issue of the city to the end of the negotiations, the fact is that both sides are engaged in a race for control on the ground.

Jerusalem, the most sensitive issue standing between Israel and the Palestinians, is also the destination of some four million pilgrims expected to visit the holy land at the turn of the millennium. This raises concerns about the possibility of renewed violence in the City of Peace.

Less than five months before the new millennium, all sorts of people with personal, religious and political agendas are converging on Jerusalem: Jewish extremists seeking to replace the mosques on the Temple Mount with the third Temple; Christians dreaming of Armageddon to speed up the second coming of Jesus; and Palestinians who insist that all of eastern Jerusalem should become the capital of an independent Palestinian state.

From Israel's point of view, it is in the nation's best interest to preserve the status quo in Jerusalem if it wants to overcome the obstacles and the challenges of this millennium year. The Israeli government realizes that it will be very difficult to make peace – and political concessions – if there is unrest in Jerusalem.

On the other hand, Palestinian Authority (PA) Chairman Yasser Arafat needs to prove to his supporters that regardless of the ups and downs in negotiations, his ultimate goal is the establishment of eastern Jerusalem as the capital of a future Palestinian state.

Recently, Arafat has made frequent statements that he will not rest until the Palestinians take over "the walls, the mosques and the churches" in eastern Jerusalem. As he bargains with Prime Minister Ehud Barak over a timetable for future Israeli withdrawals from portions of the West Bank, he is also preparing himself for final-status negotiations – in which Jerusalem will be the key issue.

So far, Israelis and Palestinians are maintaining a delicate balance of gains and losses in Jerusalem.

True, Israel has built a network of Jewish neighborhoods in eastern Jerusalem – the Palestinians call them settlements – where some 170,000 Israelis reside.

But the Palestinians have succeeded in preserving a clear division between the eastern and western parts of the city.

While the Palestinians had to acquiesce to the opening of the Tunnel

Western Wall tunnel, they have also conducted massive reconstruction work in the Al-Aksa Mosque. The opening carved out last week was, in fact, an opening to "ancient Al-Aksa," a reconstructed part of the mosque. It will soon be inaugurated as part of a festive ceremony.

The controversial construction at Har Choma, a Jewish neighborhood in eastern Jerusalem, has continued unimpeded – and the first apartments are being sold – even though the Palestinians previously threatened that it could lead to a renewed intifada, or uprising.

But the Palestinians, too, have continued, almost undisturbed, with large-scale private construction throughout the eastern part of the city. Most of the building is unlicensed, and despite the occasional demolition of illegal housing by Israeli authorities, by and large the construction cannot be stopped.

Israel had closed off a number of PA offices in eastern Jerusalem. But Orient House continues to operate as the PA's Jerusalem headquarters.

FOOD IDEAS FOR

ROSH HASHANAH

Shortcuts help to create gourmet holiday feasts

By NORENE GILLETZ

I first met Ethel Hofman at a culinary conference about 15 years ago. I was intrigued when I heard her Scottish accent, and was surprised to learn that she was Jewish!

Ethel grew up in the only Jewish family living on the Shetland Islands, north of Scotland. She learned from her mother how to incorporate local ingredients and still stay within the laws of kashrut.

Ethel still believes that Jewish cuisine, instead of being limited, opens up a new world of food to savor with family and friends at any time. My husband Soly and I were fortunate enough to be guests at her Shabbat table in Philadelphia recently. We enjoyed a delicious meal that was truly prepared with loving hands in a warm, relaxed, heimish atmosphere.

Ethel is a past president of the International Association of Culinary Professionals. She is a nationally syndicated Jewish food columnist, a regular contributor to many culinary and Jewish publications, as well as a kosher culinary expert.

One of the purposes of her book, Everyday Cooking for the Jewish Home, is to simplify time consuming or complicated recipes. Ethel has developed excellent shortcuts to help her cope with a busy schedule. She enjoys sharing time saving tips with her readers. The 350 recipes included in this kosher book are delicious.

Ethel has collected recipes from Persia, Morocco and, of course, Scotland, as well as hotels in the Catskills and kibbutzim in Israel. Here is a sampling of her recipes, including some tasty dishes for your vegetarian guests. B'tayavon.

ROASTED POMEGRANATE CHICKEN

This is a favorite Rosh Hashanah dish with Moroccan Jews. Because of their many seeds, pomegranates symbolize the hope that in the year ahead, Jews will be able to perform many worthy deeds, or mitzvot.

¼ cup olive oil
1 tbsp. minced garlic
1 (3½ to 4 lbs.) chicken, quartered
1 pomegranate, halved
¼ cup dry white wine juice of 1 lemon
1 tbsp. cinnamon-sugar
salt and pepper

Preheat oven to 375. In a cup, mix oil and garlic. Brush garlic oil over chicken.

Place chicken in a shallow baking dish. Drizzle any remaining oil over chicken. Bake in a preheated oven for 45 minutes, basting several times with pan juices, until skin is browned and juices run clear when a thigh is pierced at thickest part with a fork.

Remove 2 tbsp. seeds from pomegranate. Set aside for garnish. Squeeze juice from remaining pomegranate through a sieve into a small bowl.

In a small nonreactive saucepan, mix pomegranate juice, wine, lemon juice, and cinnamon-sugar. Bring to a boil over high heat. Reduce heat to low and cook 5 minutes. Season sauce with salt and pepper to taste.

Transfer roasted chicken to a serving platter and pierce each piece several times. Pour sauce over chicken. Garnish with pomegranate seeds and serve at room temperature. Serves 4.

ROASTED BEER BRISKET

This fine, robust dish, big enough for a holiday crowd, can conveniently be made ahead. Leftovers freeze beautifully.

2 tbsp. olive oil
5 to 6 lb. brisket
1 lb. small white boiling onions, peeled
1 medium rutabaga, cut into 1-inch chunks
1 (16-oz.) bag peeled baby carrots
3 bay leaves
1½ tsp. salt
½ tsp. black peppercorns
1 cup beer
1 lb. button mushrooms, halved or quartered

Preheat oven to 325. Heat oil in a large Dutch oven over high heat. Add brisket and cook, turning, until nicely browned on all sides, 6 to 8 minutes.

Remove from heat. Add onions, rutabaga, carrots, bay leaves, salt, and peppercorns. Pour beer over brisket and cover pot tightly. Bake in preheated oven 2 hours.

Stir in mushrooms. Cook 1 to 1½ hours longer, or until brisket and vegetables are tender. A fork should slide out easily when inserted in thickest part of brisket.

Let stand 10 minutes before

Food Ideas for Rosh Hashanah

Serving up kishke and kugel for holiday meal

slicing. Serve on a warm platter with vegetables spooned around brisket. Skim fat off surface of gravy and pass in a sauceboat on the side. Serves 12-15.

VEGETABLE KISHKE

If you love kishke but think this traditional Jewish dish is heavy and complicated, try this version. Using ready-to-eat prepared baby carrots cuts preparation time in half. This dish is especially good with braised brisket.

12 baby carrots
1 medium onion, quartered
1 small red bell pepper, cut into 1-inch chunks
½ medium zucchini, cut into 1-inch chunks
¼ cup chopped fresh parsley
¼ cup vegetable oil
1 tbsp. schmaltz (or use congealed fat from chicken soup. For vegetarians, omit schmaltz)
1 tsp. paprika
1 tsp. salt
¼ tsp. pepper
1¼ cups matzah meal

Preheat oven to 350. Coat a sheet of foil, 12 x 10 inch, with nonstick vegetable spray.

In a food processor, place carrots, onion, pepper, zucchini, parsley, oil, and schmaltz. Pulse several times, then process 30 seconds to chop finely.

Add paprika, salt, pepper and matzah meal and process briefly to mix. Shape into a roll 10 inches long and 1 inch thick. Place on prepared foil. Fold foil over to cover tightly.

Place roll on a baking sheet and bake in preheated oven 1¼ hours. Unwrap and discard foil. Kishke will be nicely crusted outside and moist inside when sliced. Serve hot. Serves 4-6.

ROASTED PEPPER KUGEL

For Rosh Hashanah, make this with yellow and red bell peppers, and to boost flavor, use handfuls of fresh herbs. If you're not having a lot of people for dinner, make two small kugels and freeze one for the Yom Kippur breaking of the fast.

1 lb. rotini noodles
1 (14-oz.) jar all-natural spaghetti sauce
3 eggs, lightly beaten
2 cups coarsely chopped, loosely packed mixed fresh herbs, such as basil, parsley, and dill
2 tsp. lemon pepper seasoning
1½ tsp. coarse kosher salt
2 large red bell peppers, cut into 1½-inch pieces
1 large yellow bell pepper, cut into 1½-inch pieces
3 tbsp. olive oil

Preheat oven to 350. Coat a large baking dish with nonstick vegetable spray.

In a large pot of salted boiling water, cook the rotini until tender but still slightly firm, 10 to 12 minutes. Drain and transfer to a large bowl.

Add spaghetti sauce, eggs, fresh herbs, lemon pepper, and ½ tsp. salt to pasta. Turn into prepared baking dish.

Arrange peppers on top of pasta mixture to cover. Drizzle olive oil over top. Sprinkle with the remaining 1 tsp. salt. Cover loosely with aluminum foil.

Bake in preheated oven for 40 minutes. Remove foil and bake until centre is set and peppers are beginning to brown, about 20 minutes longer. Serve hot or at room temperature. Serves 12-15.

Lentil dishes served by Sephardi Jews

BABY BEETS

Naturally sweet beet roots are traditionally served at Rosh Hashanah as a symbol of an abundant and sweet year to come.

16 baby beets (about 1½ lbs.)
2 tbsp. margarine
salt and pepper

Rinse beets under cold running water. Cut off leafy tops to within ½ inch of beets (see note).

Place beets in a large saucepan. Pour in enough boiling water to cover by about 2 inches. Cover pan and cook over medium-high heat for 40 to 45 minutes, or until beets are tender. Test by lifting one out of water, let cool slightly, and press with your fingers. Don't pierce with a knife, or the color will bleed.

Drain and set aside until cool enough to handle, 5 to 10 minutes. Remove skins (they will slip off easily) and slice beets ¼ inch thick or leave whole.

Melt margarine in a saucepan over medium heat. Add beets and toss to coat. Season with salt and pepper to taste. Serve hot.

Note:

To use the beet greens, wash but do not dry. Shred and cook covered in a large skillet with a little salt and pepper for 5 minutes. Drizzle lightly with garlic-flavored oil. Serves 4.

LEBANESE LENTIL SALAD

Lentil dishes are served on festive occasions by Sephardi Jews. Canned chickpeas and a handful of minced dill were added to this luscious salad when we recently ate Shabbat dinner at the Hofman home. It will also be enjoyed by their guests for the Rosh Hashanah meal.

1½ cups dried lentils
1 medium sweet onion, chopped
¾ cup currants
½ cup sweet-and-sour salad dressing
2 tsp. brown sugar
1 tbsp. ground cumin
1 tsp. salt
¼ tsp. pepper
¼ cup chopped fresh cilantro

Rinse lentils and pick over to remove any grit. In a medium saucepan, bring 4 cups water to a boil. Add lentils, reduce heat to medium-low, and simmer, uncovered, stirring occasionally, until lentils are tender but still slightly chewy, 20 to 25 minutes; drain.

Transfer lentils to a bowl. Stir in onion, currants, salad dressing, brown sugar, cumin, salt, and pepper. Sprinkle cilantro on top. Serve at room temperature. Serves 6.

ROASTED FRUITS IN CIDER

Pan-roasted winter fruits and glazed dried fruits give a new twist to the traditional Jewish compote. This is delicious served either as a side dish or for dessert.

2 tbsp. walnut or canola oil
¼ cup maple syrup
2 tsp. balsamic vinegar
2 pears, cored and sliced ¼-inch thick
2 apples, cored and sliced ¼-inch thick
½ cup chopped glazed mixed dried fruits
½ cup apple cider
2 tbsp. chopped glazed pecans

Heat oil in a large skillet over medium heat. Stir in maple syrup and balsamic vinegar.

Add pears and apples. Partially cover and cook over medium-high heat until barely tender, 8 to 10 minutes.

Remove from heat. Stir in dried fruits and apple cider.

Transfer to a serving bowl. Sprinkle pecans over top. Serve at room temperature. Serves 4.

Food Ideas for Rosh Hashanah

Natural ingredients help create tasty desserts

By LINDA MOREL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

To express joy at Rosh Hashanah, people usually serve their finest food.

Traditionally, the menu revolves around turkey, brisket and veal.

But people in kosher households can feel stress when they contemplate ending the meal with equal flourish. Without butter or cream, is it possible to create dazzling desserts?

In an attempt to have luscious cakes and meat dishes too, many kosher bakers substitute ingredients, often with disappointing results.

"The stuff never tastes right," says caterer and recipe developer Lynn Kutner, disparaging the use of margarine and artificial creams. Instead, she uses natural ingredients.

"I don't believe in phony baloney," says Kutner, claiming that the substitutions people pour into pareve cakes to fabricate dairy desserts contribute to the reputation that kosher baking is inferior, which it isn't. Kutner learned to cook from her Russian grandmother, who knew nothing about non-dairy creams or processed foods. She embraced kashrut with love, finding inspiration in its tenets.

"My grandmother was such a fabulous cook, in a way that this generation has lost," says Kutner. "It would have been bizarre for her to use fake cream, because cream doesn't belong with meat. It's almost like trying to fool God."

A teacher of Jewish cooking and baking at The New School's Culinary Arts program in Manhattan, Kutner tells students that if a recipe calls for cream, save that dish for dairy meals. If a recipe calls for butter, don't replace it with margarine, a fat made of refined vegetable oils processed to imitate the consistency of butter.

"The problem with cakes made from margarine and fake cream is that they taste dense and heavy," says Kutner, laughing because she's noticed how kids steer clear of them.

Instead of margarine, Kutner's shortening of choice is sunflower oil. During her frequent travels to France, where patisseries are renowned, she discovered that the French favor sunflower oil in baking.

Kutner also recommends corn, vegetable or soybean oils. Peanut oil is fine, if people don't mind its nutty taste.

Kutner discourages using canola oil in baking, because Canadian farmers fertilize canola with fishmeal, which imparts a fishy odor. She avoids cottonseed oil, too. Grown as a fiber crop, cotton is sprayed with pesticides that are not treated when the seeds are culled for food.

As a healthy alternative, she offers an apple cake that was an invention of her Grandma Fanny's. Instead of worrying about what foods kashrut forbade, her grandmother focused on the world of possibilities it offered. She infused this cake with frozen orange juice concentrate.

"You sense such strong flavor, you think it's loaded with butter," says Kutner, who learned to invent recipes too.

Moistened by coffee instead of milk, her honey chiffon spice cake floats off the fork.

Her recipes require separating eggs and saving some of the sugar for beating into egg whites, which gives them stability.

"When you throw the entire amount of sugar into the yolks, they become heavy," says Kutner, explaining why some pareve cakes rise poorly.

Reminiscing about helping her grandmother prepare for the High Holy Days, Kutner recalls getting off the bus in Brooklyn a block from her house and smelling the irresistible aroma from the oven.

Today when she teaches, Kutner always imparts her grandmother's advice: "Never try to trick kashrut. A good kosher cake can compete with the best baking in the world."

GRANDMA FANNY'S APPLE CAKE

2 cups unbleached, all-purpose flour, sifted
3 tsp. baking powder
pinch of salt
1 cup sugar
3 extra large eggs, separated
½ cup orange juice concentrate
½ cup oil
1 tsp. vanilla
1¼ pounds apples (about 2-3).
¼ cup sugar mixed with 2 tsp. cinnamon

Setting rack in middle position, preheat oven to 350. Grease a 9-inch springform pan with vegetable shortening, placing it on a cookie sheet.

Mix flour, baking powder, and salt. Reserve. Beat ¾ cup of sugar into yolks. Beat in juice, oil and vanilla. Reserve.

Peel, core and slice apples. Sprinkle with 1 tsp. of cinnamon sugar.

In a large bowl, beat egg whites until stiff. Continue beating while adding ¼ cup of sugar, until very stiff.

Stir flour mixture into juice mixture. Fold in one-quarter of the egg whites. Turn this batter into remaining egg whites, folding quickly but gently. Add one-third of batter to springform pan. Spread on one-third of apple slices. Sprinkle with one-third of cinnamon sugar. Continue layering.

Bake about 55-65 minutes. Lightly cover pan with foil after 30 minutes. Cool in pan.

HONEY CHIFFON SPICE CAKE

7 extra large eggs, separated
½ cup honey
½ cup hot coffee
¼ cup packed dark brown sugar
2 cups all-purpose flour, sifted
3 tsp. baking powder
½ tsp. baking soda
¼ tsp. salt
½ tsp. cinnamon
½ tsp. ground ginger
¼ tsp. allspice
¼ tsp. nutmeg
¼ cup sugar
½ cup oil

Preheat oven to 325. Beat egg yolks with honey. Slowly beat in coffee, followed by brown sugar. Cool.

Mix flour, baking powder, soda, salt and spices. Beat egg whites until soft peaks form. Gradually add sugar, beating until whites are very stiff.

Make a well in flour mixture. Pour in egg yolk mixture and oil. Blend with a whisk until smooth. Fold in one quarter of egg whites. Then turn this batter over rest of the egg whites. Gently fold for 45-60 seconds.

Turn into an ungreased 10-inch angel cake pan. Place pan on a cookie sheet.

Bake at 325 degrees for 50 minutes. Turn heat to 350 degrees, baking 10 minutes more. Invert pan and hang on glass bottle to cool.

Time to get out those veggies

By EDITH ROTHSCHILD
Special to The CJN

What better time to turn to vegetarian dishes than on the High Holy Days? Rosh Hashanah is the time when we turn inward and, in preparation for Yom Kippur, take stock of our past deeds and misdeeds.

In our present culture of being overfed on animal proteins and undernourished on whole, natural foods, it is difficult to attain any kind of spirituality. The conventional S.A.D. diet (Standard American Diet) is refined and loaded with chemicals, robbing the food of its bio-energetic properties, its wholeness and wholesomeness. It is often also irradiated and genetically engineered. Such artificial and unnatural conditions do not promote whole health and longevity since they are not life-supporting.

Thus, neither on a physical level can an acid-alkaline balance be maintained, nor on an emotional and spiritual level can fragmented food allow for a balanced and integrated higher consciousness. The more we eat from the middle range of the food spectrum: fruits, vegetables, legumes, grains, nuts and seeds, the more centred will be our thoughts, our feelings and our behavior.

How are these recipes different from all other recipes? It is neither their quick and easy-to-prepare simplicity, nor their colorful eye appeal, and it is not their natural and wholesome flavors. It is their heart-and-immune-friendly, low-calorie, low-fat, health-promoting, life-enhancing and anti-aging properties. Food is a conductor of energy. Adding a generous amount of love to all your cooking will bring you, your family, friends and guests manifold rewards during this festive, introspective season.

On a practical level, I wish to stress that I use only flax seed oil in my salads for its medicinal properties. Its essential fatty acids help eliminate toxins and viral infections, and are generally anti-carcinogenic. It also has no taste. Once opened, it needs to be stored in the refrigerator. It can be found kosher in the refrigerator section of most health food stores.

I use only umeboshi and brown rice vinegar in my salads. They are less acidic than lemon juice, and impart to food a special flavor which salt and regular vinegar can never do. They can also be bought kosher in most health food stores.

The recipes are excerpted from my book in progress, with the working title: Cooking For Wellness And Beyond.

VIVALDI SOUP

This good-for-all-seasons, heart-friendly and comforting soup provides you with low-calorie plant protein. It is a nice way to start a yom tov dinner, after your family and guests have spent long hours at the synagogue.

1 cup yellow split peas
2 medium-large yams, peeled and cut into 1-inch pieces
¼ cup onion, chopped
3 cloves garlic, minced
2 bay leaves
4 inch piece wakame (a dried seaweed bought in a health food store), optional
¾ cup celery, sliced into ½-inch pieces (also the leaves)
6 cups water
1½ cups water, extra
4 tbsp. tamari
2 tbsp. umeboshi vinegar
½ tsp. cumin
½ tsp. turmeric (optional)
pepper to taste
chopped parsley for garnish

Wash peas until foam has disappeared.

Place into a large pot, add 6 cups water, cover and bring to a rolling boil.

Turn off heat and let stand for 1 hour. This is the quicksoak method.

Meanwhile, in a small bowl soak wakame for about 8 minutes, chop fine and reserve.

After 1 hour, add 1½ cups water to the peas, bring back to boil and add yams, onions, garlic, bay leaves, wakame and celery.

Cook on medium-low heat for 35-40 minutes, or until peas are soft.

Add tamari, umeboshi vinegar, cumin, turmeric, and pepper and continue to simmer for another 10 minutes.

Adjust seasoning and remove bay leaves.

When serving, garnish with fresh, chopped parsley. Serves 8.

Helpful Hints:

Alternatively, you can soak the peas overnight in twice as much water as peas and forego the quick-soak method.

SUPER RAINBOW SALAD

No veggie is safe from my passion for this vita-packed, mix 'n' match salad. The basics are green, but it ends up mostly coloring my world with antioxidant rainbow colors. It is specially good for those poor souls who don't like vegetables but need their immune-building properties.

Basic Ingredients:

romaine or any other leaf lettuce (except iceberg which has no nutritional value)
radicchio, shredded
Belgian endive, shredded purple onion, chopped fine cucumbers, sliced fine any way you like carrots, peeled and shaved with a vegetable peeler celery, shaved with a vegetable peeler

Dressing:

Equal parts of flaxseed oil, brown rice vinegar, umeboshi vinegar and fresh chopped dill. Add chopped salad onions and marjoram according to taste.

Variations:

Add any of the following according to your taste, imagination, and availability:

Steamed carrots, cut into ¼-inch rounds (instead of the raw); finely shredded celeriac (celery root), raw or steamed 30 seconds; raw mushrooms, sliced finely grated raw or cooked beets; yellow or red peppers, parboiled, peeled, and chopped fine; leftover steamed cauliflower or broccoli.

There is no law against adding anything else that is hanging out in your fridge as long as it fits in tastewise; your only limitation is the size of your bowl and your sense of daring.

Helpful Hint:

Radicchio and Belgian endive are added in a ratio of four to one to the salad greens.

Healthful Hint:

To mention just one of the many nutritious benefits of this raw-cooked salad: one cup of Belgian endive has 4,000 times more potassium than a banana.

perfect food for any yom tov meal, as it can be made in advance and complements any menu. When finished, hide them until serving time, or they'll never make it to the table.

8 medium-large yams
1/2 tsp. ginger powder
1/4 tsp. sea salt
1/2 tsp. onion powder
1/2 tsp. garlic powder
1 1/2-2 cups matzah meal for dredging
extra virgin olive oil

Wash yams and steam or boil until barely soft; do not overcook! Cool slightly and peel, then place in refrigerator until cold.

Slice each yam carefully into 1/4 inch rounds and place on a large tray or platter; do not overlap!

In a flat plate, mix the matzah meal with the salt, onion powder, garlic powder and ginger and dredge all the slices on both sides.

Fry in a minimum of oil over medium heat on both sides until brown, and drain on paper towels, or fry in a non-stick pan without oil. Serves eight to ten.

Helpful Hints:

These latkes can be prepared ahead of time, frozen and reheated in a 250 degree oven as needed. When reheating, keep them uncovered so they remain crisp. Or they can be prepared in advance, kept in the fridge and fried the following day.

Healthful Hints:

Low fat dieters can bake these latkes in a 425 degree oven for about 25 minutes or until brown and crisp.

I make my own matzah meal by processing whole wheat matzahs in the processor. This will not make it fine but adds a crunch.

Fruit cake

APPLE CAKE WITH A DIFFERENCE

This fruit cake can be served as a side dish to any Shabbat or yom tov meal, as a desert or an in-between snack. It satisfies a sweet tooth but is no sugar monster.

8 large cooking apples (Ontario spy), peeled, seeded and cut into 1 1/2 inch chunks
1/4 cup raisins
1/2 cup dried cranberries
1 orange, peeled and chopped fine
1/2 cup dried apricots (optional)
1 cup unsweetened fruit juice
1/2 cup water
2 tbsp. lemon juice
1 tsp. lemon zest
1 tsp. pure vanilla extract
3 cups oat flour
1 tsp. cinnamon
1/4 tsp. allspice
1 1/2 tsp. baking soda
1 1/2 tbsp. baking powder (aluminum-free)

Preheat oven to 350. Place the first 9 or 10 ingredients into a saucepan, mix well, cover and bring to a boil.

Turn down heat and simmer for 15-25 minutes until most of the liquid has been reduced. (The time will depend on the quality of your apples.) Then cool the apple mixture.

Meanwhile, in a large mixing bowl, toss together the flour, spices, baking soda and baking powder and mix well.

When the apple mixture has cooled, add it to the flour mixture and stir well.

Pour into a 10x13-inch baking pan or pyrex, cover tightly with foil paper and bake for 30 minutes.

Remove the foil and bake another 20-25 minutes uncovered.

Serve warm or cold. Will keep in the refrigerator forever.

Helpful Hints:

You can buy oat flour in a health food store, or make it yourself by processing rolled oats into flour in your processor or blender.

For a quickie snack, put a piece of cake under the broiler to heat and enjoy with a cup of grain coffee.

Food Ideas for Rosh Hashanah

Careful planning essential to avoid overeating

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
CJN Staff

The calorie-laden festive meals of the High Holy Days can pose a serious challenge to the most disciplined dieters and health conscious eaters.

What's yom tov dinner without raisin challah, chicken soup and matzah balls, gefilte fish, lockshin and potato kugel, kishke, and tzimmes. And then there's the main course…and dessert. So how does one survive the holidays with one's dress size intact?

Well, according to a Toronto-area dietitian, you can have your chicken soup with matzah balls and eat it too.

Lisa Weinberg, The CJN's nutrition columnist, and a consultant to a restaurant and gourmet food store says the key to avoid over indulging during the holidays is to pace yourself and plan ahead.

"The traditional Rosh Hashanah meal involves several courses. You can taste a little bit of everything – the soup, fish, etc., and thereby pace yourself for the whole meal." She says planning ahead is important because during the holidays people tend to be eating heavy meals at both lunch and dinner.

"I find that if you have a plan in your mind before you get to somewhere, you're more likely to stick to it than when you arrive and everything looks so good and smells so good. You might make a decision – no dessert at lunch and only one appetizer course – maybe the fish at lunch, and the soup at dinner. If you've decided that in advance chances are that you'll stick to it."

Weinberg advises people not to load up on extras like challah, and to avoid other temptations like nuts, chocolates or olives – food that may be out before people sit down for the meals.

"Those are the type of things you might not pay attention to when you're eating them."

Because the meals are heavier than usual, one should make a concerted effort not to be consuming beverages with extra calories, such as juice, pop and large amounts of alcohol, she says. "That's another thing that people forget about."

For those people who are cooking two weeks prior to the holidays she says, "Make sure you don't go overboard in the tasting department. Also, send leftovers home with your guests so [the food is] not left hanging around your house."

However, those people preparing the meal or bringing a dish to someone else's house can control the fat and caloric content of individual dishes, Weinberg says.

"You have the luxury of being in control of that item, so make the most of it. You can certainly be creative and develop new twists on old traditional favorites."

For example, she suggests reducing the caloric count of cakes by replacing an egg with two egg whites, and the fat and oil with apple sauce. Desserts made with these changes are tasty low fat alternatives to their richer cousins, she says. "You can't tell the difference. These substitutions work fabulously in cakes and muffins."

For dairy or vegetarian meals, sour cream and buttermilk in recipes can easily be substituted with low fat yogurt, and cheese kugel can be made with low fat or fat-free cottage cheese and topped with fat-free sour cream, yogurt and fruit, she adds.

As for the main course, Weinberg advises using leaner cuts of meat such as turkey or chicken in place of a roast. Cranberry sauce is fat free, but it has calories because there is a high sugar component, she says. "You want to use it sparingly."

And she has good news for chicken soup aficionados; it is low in fat and in calories. To keep it light, add carrots and celery and a little bit of noodles, she says, noting that matzah balls are heavy and starchy, and a meal in themselves.

Gefilte fish, usually made from whitefish, pike and pickerel with one egg to a pound of fish, is about 110 calories and three grams of fat for a three-ounce piece – about the size of a deck of cards – and a tablespoon of horseradish is six fat-free calories, she says.

"Go for the matzah ball or go for the fish."

She cautions that these festive meals tend to have a lot of starches – matzah balls, noodles, kugel, potatoes, cakes and challah.

As for salads such as Israeli salads with olive oil and lemon juice dressing, Weinberg says when preparing this salad "feel free to be generous with lemon juice and not to overdo the olive oil. Cut back on fat, but not flavor."

And while there are fat-cutting methods to pare down the calories in many recipes, there are certain holiday specialties that should be made the old fashioned way, Weinberg says.

"Choose a few of your very favorite traditional dishes, make them the way they're supposed to be made and enjoy them. Fill in the rest of the meal with lighter fare like vegetables and salad."

For example, she says, if you're pacing yourself, start with soup, a two-ounce piece of gefilte fish, followed by turkey with stuffing.

For those with a sweet tooth, drizzling honey on challah is a fat-free way to enjoy the holiday. Ices are another good choice for a low fat dessert, she adds. But "watch the portion size – they're low in fat, but they have calories."

Ultimately, you have to be mentally prepared for the festive meals, Weinberg says. "There's no reason not to enjoy the holidays."

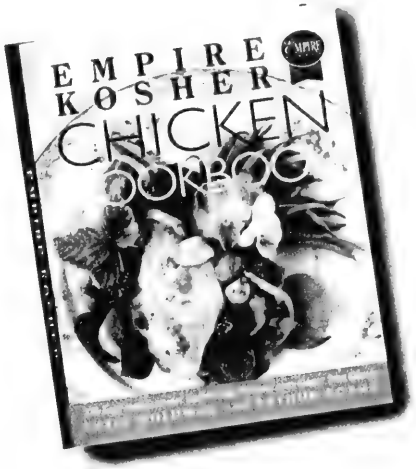
What to do with chicken?

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter



When we think of a festive yom tov meal, chicken is one of the first foods that come to mind. Chicken soup, roast chicken, chicken fricassee, stuffing – just the words are enough to make your mouth water.

On the other hand, how many times have you tossed your recipe box on the floor, glared at a hapless chicken and muttered, "What do I do with you this time?"

Empire Poultry has an answer – in fact, a whole cookbook of answers.

A major producer of kosher chicken, the Empire Kosher Poultry company is located in Mifflintown Pa. Not only do they ship chicken, turkey and duck, not to mention frozen prepared poultry products, all over the world, but they are a terrific source of recipes, that they supply in calendars, pamphlets, press releases, and even on the Internet.

This year they published a cookbook, called, not surprisingly, Empire Kosher Chicken Cookbook; 225 easy and elegant recipes for poultry and great side dishes, by Katja Goldman and Arthur Boehm (Clarkson Potter, 1999).

Make no mistake – this cookbook is a find. There are recipes for appetizers, soups, and main dishes, divided by whether they are cooked on top of the stove, in the oven or grilled. A liberal use of such ingredients as chili, coriander, peanuts and hoisin sauce, not usually thought of in connection with kosher cooking, adds a tantalizing touch to the recipes, which include ideas culled from Asian, African, French and Italian cuisine.

While many of the entries are rather involved, and use a great many ingredients, the instructions are clear enough so that following them is not onerous.

Chapters on side dishes, chutneys and salsas will help you create a complete meal that will dazzle your guests and be a real treat for the family.

Here are a few examples.

PUNGENT SHABBAT CHICKEN WITH DRIED FRUIT

1 tbsp. dried thyme
⅓ cup kosher red wine vinegar
2 tbsp. olive oil

Food Ideas for Rosh Hashanah

Empire offers suggestions for chicken dishes

To make the marinade, combine the dried fruit and orange juice in a bowl and allow fruit to plump for 15 minutes.

Combine plumped fruit, juice, garlic, ginger, oregano, thyme, vinegar, olive oil, lemon juice and bay leaves in a large bowl. Add the chicken and season to taste with salt and pepper. Toss to coat, cover, and marinate, refrigerated, from 4 hours to overnight.

Preheat oven to 375. Arrange chicken in a single layer in 2 large roasting pans, and spoon the marinade over. Sprinkle chicken with brown sugar, and drizzle over the wine. Bake until juices run clear when a joint is pierced with a fork, about 1 hour. Pour off the pan juices into a serving bowl and skim off the fat. Discard bay leaves. Sprinkle chicken with parsley and serve. Pass the pan juices separately. Serves 6 to 8.

HONEY GINGER CHICKEN

1 6-inch piece fresh ginger, peeled and coarsely chopped
12 garlic cloves, minced
16 medium scallions, white and green parts, coarsely chopped
¼ cup low-sodium soy sauce
⅓ cup honey
¼ tsp. five-spice powder
freshly ground black pepper
2 3-pound chickens, trimmed of all visible fat and cut into eighths, or 6 pounds chicken parts of your choice

Preheat oven to 350. Place ginger, garlic, scallions and half soy sauce in a food processor and process 2 minutes. Add remaining soy sauce, honey, and five-spice powder. Season to taste with pepper and process to blend.

In a large bowl, combine the chicken with the marinade and toss. Line a large 1½ to 2-inch deep baking dish with foil and add the chicken skin side down in a single layer. Spoon over the marinade and bake for 45 minutes. Turn the pieces over, baste with the sauce from the pan, and bake another 45 minutes. Serve hot or cold.

ROAST POTATOES WITH SELTZER

In this recipe, sprinkling seltzer over the potatoes before roasting makes them turn out particularly moist and crisp.

2 lbs. potatoes, scrubbed
1-2 tbsp. olive oil
salt
2 tsp. chopped fresh rosemary
1 tbsp. seltzer
freshly ground black pepper

Preheat oven to 500. Cut potatoes into 1-inch cubes, place in a large bowl, and toss with olive oil, salt and rosemary.

Turn potatoes onto a nonstick or foil-lined cookie sheet with sides. Spread the pieces for even browning. Sprinkle potatoes with the seltzer.

Roast the potatoes until brown and crispy, about 30 minutes. Grind pepper to taste over them and serve. Serves 6-8.

Note: The potatoes can be cubed in advance and held for one day, refrigerated, in a bowl of water. Drain and dry them well before proceeding.

TOASTED CHALLAH CHALISH

4 large thick slices challah, or 8 smaller slices
1 tbsp. kosher light mayonnaise
2 tbsp. kosher grainy mustard
1 tsp. kosher Dijon mustard
2 tbsp. chopped fresh dill
Juice of ½ lemon
3 cups cooked cubed skinless chicken
Four ½-inch-thick slices ripe beefsteak tomato
2 handfuls mesclun (mixed baby lettuce)

Toast the challah lightly. Meanwhile, in a large bowl, using a fork, combine mayonnaise, mustards, dill and lemon juice.

Add the chicken and toss to coat. Place half the chicken salad on each of 2 challah slices (or divide it equally among 4 pieces). Top with the tomato and mesclun. Cover with the remaining challah, press down gently, and slice the sandwiches in half. Serves 2.

Food Ideas for Rosh Hashanah

Advance preparation is the real key to success

By EILEEN GOLTZ
Special to The CJN

The main courses for many holiday meals are set in stone.

Appetizers, soup and salads, however, can be as wild and crazy as we want them to be. The key to a great appetizer or first course is to serve something that can be made ahead of time and served quickly.

The following recipes are easy to make, can all be made at least one day in advance and are different enough to spice up any of your holiday meals.

CHICKEN ROLL IN PASTRY WITH MUSHROOM SAUCE

1 lb. package puff pastry
1 lb. ground chicken
1 small grated onion
2 eggs bread crumbs
salt and pepper
1 tbsp. oil
dash poultry seasoning

In a bowl, mix together the ground chicken, grated onion, eggs, breadcrumbs, salt and pepper, oil, and poultry seasoning. The mixture should be soft so only use a small amount of the bread crumbs. Heat oil in a large frying pan and add mixture and stir until brown. Remove from heat and cool. Roll out the puff pastry to a 11x15 sheet. Place meat mixture along the long side of the pastry and roll up, tucking ends in. Place on an ungreased cookie sheet.

Can be prepared up to this point and baked later. Bake in a 425 oven for 12 to 15 minutes until browned. Cut into slices to serve and top with the following sauce.

Mushroom Sauce:
2 tbsp. margarine
2 tbsp. flour
1 tbsp. soy sauce
sprinkle of dry onion soup mix
1 cup water
2 tbsp. white wine
½ pound mushrooms, sliced

Melt the margarine in a saucepan. Add the flour and mix together until smooth. Add all other ingredients except the mushrooms. Heat and stir until thickened. Add mushrooms. Cook one minute and pour over meat roll when serving.

CASHEW SALAD

⅓ cup sugar
⅓ cup vinegar
1 tsp. dry mustard
1 clove garlic, finely chopped
1 tsp. celery seed
salt and freshly ground black pepper to taste equal parts fresh raw spinach and leaf lettuce, enough to serve 6 to 8
½ cup whole or coarsely chopped cashews, or more to taste

Combine the sugar, vinegar, mustard, garlic, celery seed, salt, and pepper in a bowl and whisk until combined. Toss the greens in the dressing and place on individual serving plates. Sprinkle with the cashews and serve immediately. Serves 6 to 8.

ROASTED SWEET POTATOES AND ONIONS

4 medium peeled sweet potatoes, cut into 2-inch pieces (about 2-¼ lbs.)
2 medium vidalia or other sweet onions, cut into 1-inch pieces (about 1 lb.)
2 tbsp. extra-virgin olive oil
¼ tsp. garlic-pepper blend
½ tsp. salt

Preheat oven to 425. Combine all ingredients in a 13x9-inch baking dish, tossing to coat. Bake at 425 for 35 minutes or until tender, stirring occasionally. Serves 6.

TROUT APPETIZER WITH HORSERADISH SAUCE

1½ lb. smoked trout

Horseradish Sauce:
4 tbsp. horseradish mustard
½ cup tarragon vinegar
2 tbsp. ketchup
1 tbsp. paprika
½ tsp. cayenne pepper
1 tsp. salt
1 clove garlic
1 cup vegetable oil
½ cup shallots
½ cup chopped celery

Remove skin and bones from fish. Flake and place in cocktail glasses or iced bowls lined with lettuce. Place all ingredients for horseradish sauce in blender and blend thoroughly. Spoon the sauce over the fish and garnish with parsley and a lemon wedge. Chill well before serving. Serves 5 to 6.

HOT AND SOUR SOUP

4 cups chicken broth, skimmed very well
½ cup shredded cooked chicken
¼ cup diced tofu
¼ cup bamboo shoots sliced
6 Chinese dried mushrooms soaked and softened, sliced
2 eggs or just the whites
1 tbsp. white vinegar
3 tbsp. soy sauce
1 tbsp. cornstarch
cold water, to make a paste with cornstarch
1 tsp. or more Chinese hot sauce, to taste
sesame seed oil, to taste

Use homemade or canned chicken broth. Add to the broth the chicken, softened and sliced mushrooms, tofu and bamboo shoots. You can use more or less of the chicken and tofu if you like. Season with the vinegar and soy sauces and bring the mixture to a boil. Mix the cornstarch with a bit of cold water to make into a paste and whisk into the hot soup to thicken slightly. Fork beat the eggs (or just use the whites) and add and swirl and stir into the soup. Lastly, add the hot oil to taste. Oriental sesame oil may also be added with the hot oil for some extra flavor. Serves 6.

Kids Who Study Music Have Greater Success in School

University of California-Irvine researchers have discovered that involving young children in music programs improves their spatial IQ — the kind of intelligence needed for math and science. The best news is that the improvement occurs whether a child is "musical" or not, and is maintained for long periods of time — perhaps permanently.

Researchers all agree on one thing: the younger the better. Four, three and even two years old is not too soon to begin teaching music to young children. It appears to strengthen important neural connections in the developing brain, giving the children an advantage in spatial reasoning.

The Yamaha Corporate Music School in the North York district has carefully researched programs tailored to the developmental levels of beginners of all ages from two years old and up! Private lessons are available for more advanced students. Free preview lessons in various courses are being offered to beginners during designated Open House days in August and September. The dates are: Saturday, August 28; Wednesday, September 1; and Sunday, September 12. Please call to reserve your free lesson: (416) 224-5590.

Success in music. Success in life. It's no coincidence.

The Yamaha Music School was the best place to help our daughter Laura develop her creativity. Although she is only 12 years old, she has performed her own compositions at Yamaha Junior Original Concerts in Boston, San Diego and Tokyo.

Shoe store has loyal clientele

Since opening 20 years ago in 1979, Little Shoe Palace has built a loyal clientele. Customers come from all over Toronto and the environs, and recommend the store to friends and relations.

Little Shoe Palace spans the generations. Customers whose parents once brought them to the store, now bring their own children. Proprietor Joe Marmorstein plans to stay the course for many years.

Little Shoe Palace stands on 3 pillars: prices, selection and service. "The prices bring them in," Marmorstein smiles, "and the selection and service bring them back."

Customers can't get over how much money they save, compared to other retailers. And yet, they find the same merchandise here, and much better service. And what a huge selection! Little Shoe Palace carries footwear for kids of all ages from babies and toddlers right up to 'teens. Sizes include width variations and half sizes up to adult size 10's for fast-growing boys and girls.

With a huge variety of lines and a stock of several thousand pairs, you're sure to find what suits your son or daughter for sports, school or social events. "We always have enough inventory to satisfy every customer," says Marmorstein.

Athletic lines include Nike, Reebok and Adidas; and you'll find fashionable designer brands like Stride-Rite, Manniqui-Moda, Minibel, Superfit and Buster Brown. Little Shoe Palace also specializes in a wide range of first shoes for baby, from Bonni Stuart, Stride-Rite, Minibel and Dinella.

And except for Little Shoe Palace, no Canadian store carries the exclusive, enduringly popular Italian-crafted Dinella line.

Winter wear includes Sorel boots, the warmest in Canada, for at least $10-$15 less than at most retailers. There are also Robin jackets, snowsuits and coats, and Badge and SOS outerwear made by Robin, 20% lower than other stores.

Every kid receives individual attention; and each foot is measured, both left and right. No two kids are alike: neither are their feet. Little Shoe Palace provides everyone with custom fitting and full service. And yet, you enjoy discounts of at least 15-20% off what you'd pay elsewhere.

So bring your kids to Little Shoe Palace: 3189 Bathurst St., two lights north of Lawrence, phone 416-785-5290; or 67 Doncaster Ave. north of Steeles, east off Yonge, phone 905-731-8520. Hours are Sun. 10-5, Mon.-Wed. 10-6, Thurs. 10-7:30, Fri. 10-5; closed on Saturday (Shabbos).

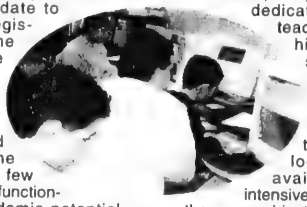
The school with a heart

The Merle L. Levine Academy Inc., "the school with a heart," is co-ed and is inspected by the Ministry of Education. The Academy remains resolute in its mandate to provide students registered in grades one through OAC with the academic and/or social skills they require to become independent learners and well-integrated members of the community. In just a few years, most students functioning below their academic potential because of learning and/or attentional difficulties, can be returned to a regular public or private school to continue their education within the mainstream.



Under the ongoing direction of Principal/Director Merle Langbord Levine, B.A., M.Ed., and Vice Principal Yuwattee Persaud, B.A., B.Ed., M.A., a caring, dedicated and well-trained teaching staff develop a highly individual, student friendly educational plan for each student. Each plan embodies the best elements of both the traditional and technological pedagogies available to provide intensive remedial teaching in the core subjects, combined with the teaching of strategies for the transference and integration of these skills into the content subjects. Registration is now being accepted.

Your child can master math

Does your child have math trouble? Or is he or she so gifted, the standard curriculum is too easy? Or is your young student doing OK, but eager to excel? If you answered yes to any of these questions, call Math Masters. Math Masters offers 1-on-1 home tutoring for all levels, primary to OAC. Teaching is linked to the curriculum, and aims at getting far enough ahead to let the slower student keep up, yet give the child who learns faster the needed challenge.

No computers or calculators here. For most purposes, a well-taught mind can match a calculator; and the brain's batteries don't run down. Math Masters students learn basic math along with general study skills, and progress from there, growing more able and more confident.

Every tutor has at least a bachelor's degree in mathematics, and is tested for ability to communicate and get along with students. Your tutor will pay personal attention to your child's strengths and weaknesses, and report weekly to Math Masters.

You may hire a tutor for as long as you want; and hours are flexible, including week nights and weekends. For details call: (416) 425-6284.

Computer training easy at KEYBOARDERS

Computer therapy?? KEYBOARDERS' specialty! KEYBOARDERS' graduates have coined a new phrase to describe what we do, as we gently prod people of all ages into being comfortable with technology!

With KEYBOARDER'S patient, caring instructors, small class sizes and specially designed courses, hundreds of people have been trained to use the computer effectively for what they need — be it typing letters, minutes of group meetings, sending letters via e-mail to friends and relatives around the world, or browsing through the Internet sites to arrange a great vacation! Sound good? All you have to do is pick up the phone and ask for your very own "computer therapy."

And, although kids don't need "computer therapy", they certainly need to learn to touch-type and use the computer effectively. Pupils who hand in neat, typed homework completed without parents' help enjoy better self-esteem and higher grades. Moreover, typing can often help children with learning disabilities.

Since 1996, KEYBOARDERS has been a successful typing and computer training centre for kids & adults alike, with small stress-free, instructor-led classes and unlimited practice time. For fall schedules, call KEYBOARDERS, at Bayview and John: 905-731-4744.

It's Ashkenaz time

TORONTO — Come to Bellevue Park in the heart of Kensington Market at noon on Sept 5. Grab a handcrafted hat, costume or banner and join thousands of revellers in a jubilant display of community spirit, as they take to the streets of Toronto for the third biennial Ashkenaz parade.

The parade is one of the key events of Ashkenaz: a festival of new Yiddish culture, which runs from Aug. 30 to Sept. 6.

A procession of music, color and community celebration, the parade is the festival's largest participatory event. Participants can dance to the rhythms of klezmer and samba bands as the Nayeh Velt Angel leads the way from the heart of the Toronto Jewish community's roots in Kensington Market to Harbourfront Centre, the main venue of the Ashkenaz festival.

Anybody can take part in some aspect of the parade, be it as stilt-walker, costumed character, mask-maker or banner-holder.

Volunteers are urgently needed to make giant puppets, costumes and banners. Work alongside professional artists to build anything from Yiddish culture-inspired hats and festive schmattes, to giant puppets and banners.

Everyone in the family can help get costumes and props ready. Parade production continues until Sept. 3 at the Bloor JCC at 750 Spadina Ave. Production hours are 10 a.m. to 9 p.m., Sunday to Friday.

The 1999 parade team is led by Anne Barber, artistic co-director of the award-winning, Toronto Island-based Shadowland Theatre, specializing in the highly visual theatre of mask, puppetry and outdoor spectacle.

The team will be joined by international theatre artist from the United Kingdom, Peter Kiddle. Kiddle founded the Theatre of Public Works, which creates participatory theatre projects with communities all over the world.

For more information, call 203-0946 or the Ashkenaz volunteer hotline at 410-9851.

Ashkenaz will offer an array of Yiddish performances

By ERIC STEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The third edition of the biennial Ashkenaz Festival of New Yiddish Culture promises to be the biggest and most spectacular yet, with over 175 artists from 10 countries converging on Toronto's Harbourfront Centre between Aug. 30 and Sept. 6.

With the vast array of artistic offerings and jam-packed performance schedule (most events are free), it will take some shrewd decisions to figure out which concerts to attend. The following are some recommendations to assist your festival planning.

If you see only one act at this year's festival, it ought to be the internationally renowned ensemble Brave Old World. For a decade now, BOW has led the pack in defining the direction of contemporary Yiddish music.

Their virtuosic musicianship, spectacular dynamics and inventive arrangements of traditional Yiddish melodies are incomparable. They bring a profound sense of innovation to the music, mixing in jazz and classical elements while remaining firmly rooted in a Yiddish sound.

On Sept. 4, they will showcase their regular concert repertoire, featuring music from their most recent CD, the groundbreaking Blood Oranges.

On Sept. 5, the group will present their awe-inspiring Songs of the Lodz Ghetto, 1940-1993, a brilliant program featuring music created in the Nazi ghetto of Lodz, Poland, as well as a few of their own contemporary compositions. A moving, soulful, and incredibly uplifting performance, this is not to be missed. It is a ticketed event so buy early.

One of the musical highlights of this year's festival will be the specially commissioned Ashkenaz Orchestra Project, a 20-piece ensemble featuring the top klezmer musicians in the world. This supergroup will present six new compositions created specifically for the event. Combining klezmer, jazz, middle eastern, and Roma styles, the group is sure to shatter boundaries and excite audiences with a huge sound and scintillating virtuosity. (Sept. 1 and 2 – a ticketed event)

Klezmer Conservatory Band.

Renowned New York jazz trumpeter Dave Douglas and his group, Charms of the Midnight Sky, will perform a specially commissioned tribute to the late clarinetist Dave Tarras, the "father of Yiddish-American Klezmer music." This concert promises an exciting marriage of traditional American klezmer styling with contemporary avant-garde arrangements and stunning musicianship. (Sept. 1 and 2 – a ticketed event)

Boston's 12-piece Klezmer Conservatory Band has been at the heart of the klezmer revival since it began two decades ago. The favored choice among the older set, their big-band sound draws mostly from the style and repertoire of the great American-Jewish klezmorim of the interwar period. If you want to hear standards like Rumania, Rumania, this

Party City Superstore Opens in Thornhill

Since Party City opened its first superstore in 1985, it has grown phenomenally. Today, it's the world's largest party supply retailer, with over 390 superstores in Canada, the U.S., Puerto Rico and Europe.

In Canada, Party City has also met with great customer response. Party City President Michael Shneer identifies three reasons for this success: variety of merchandise, deep discounted prices and great service.

Shneer stated "the response from the Jewish community to our Woodbridge and North York superstores has been outstanding, but many Jewish customers in Thornhill and Richmond Hill areas have been asking us to open a superstore." In response, Party City has just opened, a new, conveniently located superstore at 7171 Yonge Street (just North of Steeles, beside Hy & Zels).

With over 20,000 items in every superstore, Party City offers Canada's largest selection of party merchandise, and a constant inflow of new products. No matter what you're planning, gala event or informal get-together, everything you need is here.

Looking forward to Fall? There are fall and back to school supplies. Thinking ahead to your next big occasion — maybe even next Chanukah or Pesach? There's a huge range of plates, cups, napkins, table covers and other items with Chanukah or Pesach designs.

Everyday catering supplies include steam and roaster pans, platters, foil containers, trays, serving bowls, and cake decorating products. (You can take cake decorating lessons, too!). Paperware, plastic dishes, cutlery and accessories come in hundreds of patterns and colours.

There are thousands of items and accessories for weddings, showers, and anniversaries from the 1st to the 50th, including customized invitations and thank you cards. Bridal accessories range from confetti to place cards, car pompoms to garter belts.

Here's everything you need for Bar/Bat Mitzvahs, birthdays, sweet 16's and graduations, including a humungous loot bag and favour selection. There's a vast variety of hats, horns, banners, pinatas, candles, giftwrap, ribbons, bows, bags, centrepieces, balloon sandweights, inflatable guitars and glowsticks, along with many new party ideas.

Costumes, masks, wigs, makeup and accessories are in stock year-round, for every season, religious or secular. For example, Party City carries Canada's biggest Hallowe'en selection, much of which is suitable for Purim.

You can rent helium tanks to fill balloons, or have Party City fill them. "We sell a dozen helium-filled latex balloons for only $8.99," Shneer points out, "while others charge more than $13 per dozen."

By operating large-scale, Party City earns huge purchasing discounts which it passes on to it's customers in the form of everyday low prices. With its lowest price guarantee policy, Party City promises to beat any competitor's prices by 15%.

Party City has become a destination point for buying greeting cards because they sell Carlton cards at 40% off the suggested retail price — lower than anywhere else in Canada. And while Party City stocks many of the same wedding or Bar/Bat Mitzvah invitation books as other stores, they discount the book prices by 25%.

Staff are party mavens, eager to give you all the time and assistance you need. Free checklists help you choose and plan; shelves are kept fully stocked; every store carries the same huge inventory, and is constantly replenished through computerized tracking.

Party City's superstores are bright, clean and spacious, exuding a festive atmosphere. You'll enjoy shopping here. Shneer promises "You won't find a bigger selection at the guaranteed lowest prices anywhere else in Canada."

There are 15 Southern Ontario area locations. For the new 7171 Yonge Street store, call 905-771-9438. For the Woodbridge store, at 156 Chrislea Rd. at Hwys. #400 & #7, call 905-856-2125. Jewish writers being showcased at Ashkenaz

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Ashkenaz, at Harbourfront from Aug. 30 to Sept. 6, is known primarily as a musical celebration offering a profusion of fusion jazz, klezmer and other toe-tapping musical forms in performance.

In counterpoint to the music, this third biennial festival of new Yiddish culture also features a handful of intriguing literary events involving some of Canada's most talented writers on Jewish themes. (A few American writers have been added for good measure.)

On Aug. 31 at 7 p.m. in the Brigantine Room, three Toronto writers read from their work in a free event called Reading the Diaspora. Novelist Cary Fagan, poet Libby (Liebe) Scheier and playwright Jason Sherman are among the city's best-known scribes, Jewish or not. Given their respective talents, they would probably each be famous by now if they were living in the United States.

Re-Imagining the Shtetl (Premiere Dance Theatre, Sept. 1, 7 p.m.) brings together the acclaimed Montreal Yiddish novelist Yehuda Elberg (Ship of the Hunted, The Empire of Kalman the Cripple) with Toronto-based novelist Lilian Nattel (The River Midnight) and the American scholar Yaffa Eliach, author of a recent monumental study of the Polish shtetl Eishyshok (There Once Was A World).

After working with a translator to render two of his books into English, Elberg sent the pair of manuscripts to Syracuse University Press two years ago for consideration. Both were promptly accepted, and have been greeted with exultant critical acclaim. In a feature review, the Globe and Mail hailed Elberg as a literary master.

Lillian Nattel

Although some 45 years Elberg's junior, the 40-something Nattel has also produced raves from the likes of the New York Times, Time magazine and other international publications for her first novel, The River Midnight. Focusing on life in a 19th-century Polish shtetl, the award-winning book is due for a third printing in Canada. It has also been published in the United States, England, and in Germany, Italy and Holland in translation.

Nattel, who visited Poland for the first time last spring, plans to talk about her trip as well as read from her book during Re-Imagining the Shtetl, one of the relatively few events at Ashkenaz to charge admission ($8).

In addition to his involvement with Re-Imagining the Shtetl, Elberg is giving a free lecture entitled The Music of a Jewish Sigh (Urban Square Tent, Sept. 6, 4 p.m.) Eliach, too, is lecturing on Restoring a Vanished Past: Its Life, Time and Humor (Urban Square Tent, Sept. 2, 8:30 p.m., free).

Justin Lewis, a writer, storyteller and Judaic scholar who divides his time between Toronto and New York, has unearthed an amazing 500-year-old manuscript by an unknown author who describes the bitter and bawdy lives of Jewish women in both contemporaneous and biblical times, in "a juicy, rhyming Yiddish." In Smart, Strong, Sexy and Frum: Women of the Bible in a Medieval Yiddish Manuscript, Lewis discusses the recently rediscovered manuscript, and reads from his own translation-in-progress. (Urban Square Tent, Tues. Aug. 31, 6 p.m., free)

Ashkenaz's Finf-Un-Tsen (5 & 10) Literary Cabaret assembles more than a dozen Canadian writers for three free readings.

The talent includes Donia B. Clenman, Ann Decter, Diane Flacks, Jonathan Garfinkle, Susan Glickman, Joseph Kertes, Shel Krakofsky, Hal Niedzviecki, Emily Pohl-Weary, Michael Redhill, Karen Shenfeld, Ken Sherman, Simcha Simchovitch, Nathalie Stephens and Martin Waxman (Urban Square Tent, Sept 1 at 9:30 p.m.; Sept. 5 at 6 p.m.; and Sept. 6 at 2:30 p.m.)

San Francisco writers Marcia Falk and Max Apple are also giving readings. For information on these and other Ashkenaz events, call Harbourfront information at 973-3000 or the box office at 973-4000.

Yaffa Eliach

A 'reel' treat for film lovers

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Ashkenaz, the festival of new Yiddish culture, which starts on Aug. 30, has a film festival in store for movie fans.

Called the Reel Ashkenaz Film Series, and curated by Marc Glassman, it gets under way on Aug. 30 at 6:30 p.m. with a screening of Great Cantors of the Golden Age (United States).

Murray Simon's 1990 documentary celebrates chazzanut, the cantorial art. By his estimation, chazzanut flourished in Europe in the decades before World War II, when cantors like David Roitman, Yosele Rosenblatt, Adolph Katchko and Mordechai Hershman were considered stars.

They were famous for the pitch of their voices, the clarity of their diction and the pathos of their sobs and sighs.

As Simon says, among the best of the best were Rosenblatt, who was renowned for his baritone and his falsettos, and Hershman, whose purity of voice could have enabled him to be an opera singer.

This documentary is based, in part, on Joseph Seiden's 1931 film, The Voice of Yiddish.

In addition, the following films will be shown.

Aug. 31, 5:30 p.m. Chants of Sand and Stars (France, Holland and Israel) traces the history of the Diaspora through music.

Aug. 31, 9:30 p.m. The Golem (Germany), a silent film classic, is accompanied by Justin Haymes.

Sept. 1, 6:30 p.m. A showcase of American, German and Canadian shorts address issues of their time. Cantor on Trial (United States), The Legend of Mrs. Goldman and Almighty God (Germany), Punim (Germany), The Cowboy (United States), Gimpel the Fool (United States), White (Canada), In November, 1943 (Canada) and How I learned to Relax and Love the Golem (Canada).

Sept. 1, 10 p.m. The Purim Jester (Poland). Joseph Green's 1937 Yiddish drama, starring Miriam Kressyn and Hymie Jacobson, is set in a Galician shtetl.

Sept. 2, 5 p.m. Sabbath in Paradise (Germany) theorizes that cultural expression is at the core of contemporary Jewish life.

Sept. 2, 9:30 p.m. Children Must Laugh (Poland). Directed by the legendary Aleksander Ford in 1935, and banned because of its outspokenness concerning anti-Semitism, this is a blend of fact and fiction.

Sept. 4, 8 p.m. The South: Alice Never Lived Here (Israel) explores the roots of a Sephardi woman who holds that Sephardim are second class citizens in Israel.

Sept. 5, 1:30 p.m. Our Children (Poland). The acclaimed Yiddish comedians, Shimon Dzigan and Yisroel Shumacher, return to their homes in the wake of the Holocaust.

Sept. 6, 11:30 a.m. A selection of animated shorts for children of all ages. Almonds and Wine, The Man Who Stole Dreams, Pies, I'm Your Man, Tender Tale of Cinderella Penguin and Onions and Garlic.

All films will be screened at the Studio Theatre.

BOOK DELIVERS LITHUANIAN LORE

New York's YIVO Institute has partnered with the Wayne State University Press in Detroit to produce an English-language version of a book by Jewish educator and essayist Hirsz Abramowicz (1881-1960) that illuminates cultural and social life in Lithuania and neighboring territories before 1939.

Profiles of A Lost World: Memoirs of East European Jewish Life before World War II is a literary hybrid: it's part memoir, part historical and ethnographic study, and part biographical dictionary of some leading cultural figures of the era. Abramowicz wrote some of the essays contemporaneously as a young writer with a bright future ahead of him, and the rest in retrospect as a Jewish refugee in postwar New York, having lost his wife, relatives and friends in the Holocaust.

While the focus is the city of Vilna, known as the Jerusalem of Lithuania, Abramowicz also devotes considerable space to describing the Lithuanian countryside and its Jewish population in essays such as Rural Jewish Occupations in Lithuania and The Diet of Lithuanian Jews.

Chaim Bialik, Mendele Mokher Sforim, I.L. Peretz, Achad Ha'am and Chaim Weizmann are only some of the personalities Abramowicz describes, having encountered all of these figures through his involvement in the lively cultural scene that the government attempted to suppress.

First published in Yiddish some 40 years ago, Abramowicz's book was edited in part by his daughter, Dina Abramowicz, a longtime librarian at the YIVO Institute, who also supplied a chapter on her father's life and work.

Anyone interested in Jewish life in prewar eastern Europe should find Profiles of A Lost World an engrossing read.

Movie News: Country music singer Dolly Parton has paid an amount in the "low six figures" for the rights to The Jew Store, a memoir by Stella Suberman about being Jewish in the American South.

The book is based on the experiences of the Bronson family, who moved in the 1920s from the Bronx to a Tennessee town, where they ran a dry goods store. Parton hopes to produce a movie based on the material.

Holy Land Photographs: Photographer Neil Fox has produced Psalms of Renaissance, a new solo exhibit of photos of vistas from the Middle East. The photographs are rendered in brilliant saturated colors, utilizing a process called Dye Transfer.

Opens Sept. 9 and runs until Oct. 30 at Gallery Arcturus, 80 Gerrard St. E., 977-1077. Opening reception, Sept. 9, 5:30 to 8:30 p.m.

Writing Workshop: Award-winning writer Cary Fagan is offering a fiction workshop this fall. Fagan is the highly acclaimed author of six books of fiction, including the recent novel Felix Roth and the children's book, Gogol's Coat.

For several years Fagan has been conducting fiction writing workshops for the University of Toronto and the Toronto Writing Workshop. This fall, however, he is running his workshop independently for the first time. It begins Monday Oct. 18 and runs for eight weeks. The location is Fagan's studio on Lonsdale Road in Forest Hill. The cost is $200.

"I find teaching a very rewarding experience," Fagan says. "There is nothing I like better than to talk about fiction and how it works with a group of passionate writers. There is always something interesting in a new piece of writing, even by a beginning writer.

"I think my strength as a teacher is being able to see what a writer is struggling to get out and helping them to find the way."

The workshop is open to writers at all levels. To register, call 489-1071.

Travel books offer interesting views of European countries

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

With the bustle of the summer tourist season just about over, now might be the perfect time to consider a European vacation.

If your destination is France, look no further than Discovering the Villages of France (Raincoast) by Michael Busselle.

With the ease of a seasoned traveller, he describes picturesque burgs – such as Riquewihr in Alsace and Vezelay in Burgundy – you can easily visit. The book is lavishly illustrated with color photographs of the places he recommends.

Should you be thinking solely of southern France, which is known for its golden beaches and snow-capped mountains, Province & the Cote d'Azur (Raincoast) will fit the bill.

Spain is alluring, and one of its most stylish cities is Barcelona. If you're heading that way, read Barcelona (Raincoast).

There is much more to Scotland than its fabled highlands and its vast lochs. If you're tempted, try reading Scotland (Raincoast).

Lying on the edge of Scotland's Firth of Forth, Edinburgh can be delightful if you know where to go. Edinburgh (Raincoast) will lead you in the right directions.

Renowned for its wilderness areas, Finland has 187,000 lakes and 179,000 islands. But, of course, Finland offers more than just beautiful scenery, as you'll discover by reading Finland (Raincoast).

If you plan to be in the Czech Republic, Austria or Hungary any time soon, you'll probably be interested in perusing Cheap Eats in Prague, Vienna and Budapest (Raincoast). As the saying goes, armies march on their stomachs.

Musical lineup at Ashkenaz '99 bigger and more versatile is the concert to see. (Aug. 30 – a ticketed event)

Unofficially representing New York's so-called Radical Jewish Culture movement, the brilliant clarinetist David Krakauer will perform with his avant-garde, genre-bending ensemble, Klezmer Madness. An intense event that is sure to shatter the senses (and possibly the eardrum) with equal turns of shrieking rambunctiousness, dissonant chaos, and funky urban rhythms. Don't bring your bubbie and zayde to this one. (Sept. 4 and 5).

Advocates of "authenticity" will enjoy the archaic sound of Khevrisa, a mini-supergroup modelled on the east European klezmer kapelye of the 19th century. With traditional instrumentation (prima and sekund violins, cymbalom, and bass) and repertoire gleaned from the oldest known recording and folk song collections, Khevrisa's academic yet soulful approach hearkens back to the days before klezmer was "corrupted" by American influences.

Material will range from solemn nigguns to lively freilachs. The group will also discuss the history and social context within which the old-time kapelye functioned. (Sept. 5)

Ever wonder what a typical village wedding is like in the southeastern corner of Europe? Check out legendary Bulgarian saxophonist Yuri Yanakov's presentation of Balkan, Rom and Turkish-influenced wedding music. This raucous and thoroughly contemporary form is known for its ridiculously fast tempos, unfathomable rhythms, and searing virtuosity, and is sure to blow the minds of all in attendance. Not for the faint of heart. (Sept. 2 and 4)

For a more contemplative experience, don't miss the beautifully rendered interpretations of Yiddish vocal and instrumental nuggets by Brooklyn's Deborah Strauss and Jeff Warschauer Duo. This husband and wife team, also of the Klezmer Conservatory Band, perform with passion, vitality and a refined elegance. Their performances range from exquisitely mellow to joyously upbeat. (Aug. 31)

David Krakauer will surely shatter the senses.

Another virtuosic duo, making their first North American appearance, is Klezmer en Buenos Aires. They could prove to be the sleeper hit of the festival. With unique interpretations of klezmer and Yiddish standards, incorporating small doses of jazz and tango, the pair's stunning, nearly telepathic interplay is sure to captivate. (Sept. 1, 4 and 6)

Toronto's vibrant Yiddish music scene is represented by The Flying Bulgar Band, whose jazz and Latin-inflected innovations have taken them so far beyond their roots that they dropped the word klezmer from their name. (Aug. 31 and Sept. 5)

For more orthodox stylings check out local stalwarts Hu-Tsa-Tsa, who balance tradition and originality in their dynamic interpretations of klezmer standards. (Sept. 6)

More eclectic is Czech-born Torontonian Lenka Lichtenberg, who combines Middle-Eastern, eastern European, and contemporary music in an expressive and moving style, backed by a hot band of local players. (Sept. 5)

Also worth seeing are Flying Bulgars Marilyn Lerner and Dave Wall, who promise intriguing jazz-influenced compositions set to contemporary Jewish poetry. (Sept. 1 and 6)

On Sept. 3, Ashkenaz takes a break, but diehard klezmaniacs can catch an unaffiliated event at the Free Times Cafe (320 College St.), where locals Beyond the Pale will present their unique form of klezmer and east-European fusion, joined by special guest Eve Monzingo of the Chicago Klezmer Ensemble.

Other musical events worth noting include lectures and workshops on klezmer and related musical styles by Hankus Netsky (Aug. 31), Yuri Yanakov (Sept. 2), and Zev Feldman (Sept. 6).

Last, but not least, the Festival All-Star Dance Party should be a raucous affair, enlivened by the musical mayhem of a throw-together band of top klezmorim who will attempt to make you dance until your legs fall off. (Sept. 5) Check the festival program for all scheduling.

Paris is alive with the bright light of Jewish life

By CURT LEVIANT and ERIKA PFEIFER LEVIANT
Special to the CJN

PARIS — The old saying that Paris is the City of Lights is even truer now that all the older floodlights that used to illuminate the famous landmarks have been replaced with super-bright halogen lights.

This lighting, which in its intensity almost imitates daylight, has transformed the city at night. It glitters like an extended sparkling necklace. Among the gems glinting in the night are the Arch of Triumph, the Louvre, and crowning them all, the Eiffel Tower.

But Paris is also a city of lights of another kind — the bright light of Jewish life. With the exception of the period of expulsion from France in 1395 – no Jews were known to be in Paris in the 15th and 16th centuries – Jewish residence in France and in Paris has been almost continuous for 1,400 years.

France was the first European nation to grant Jews citizenship and there have been three Jewish prime ministers – Leon Blum, Rene Mayer, and Pierre Mendes-France.

It was in Paris at The Castille, on quiet rue Cambon (just behind the Ritz) where Theodore Herzl wrote The Jewish State. By coincidence, we stayed in that very hotel.

A modern and stylish hotel, the Castille, publicizes its Herzl connection. Above the main entrance, a plaque in French and in Hebrew, reads: "In this house, in 1895, Benjamin Ze'ev Herzl, founder of the Zionist movement, wrote his prophetic book, The Jewish State, which foresaw the re-establishment of a Jewish state in Israel."

The Castille located in the heart of Paris, is within walking distance of two of the most famous and beautiful synagogues in Paris – the grand cathedral synagogue on rue Victoire, built in 1874, and the slightly smaller, but an equally dazzling building on rue Buffault.

In France, shuls are generally not known by congregational name, but by the name of the street on which they are located. Both congregations welcomed visitors, inviting them to partake of the beautiful kiddush after Sabbath services.

A good place to begin one's tour of Jewish Paris is the area around rue des Rosiers, in the historic Marais district. Known as the Pletzl (Yiddish for little place or square) it was the Juiverie – the Jewish residential quarter – some 700 years ago when rue des Rosiers was called the Street of the Jews.

Here is a picturesque part of old Paris within walking distance of the new Picasso Museum. On its narrow, winding streets one can find synagogues, little prayer rooms, schools, kosher restaurants, groceries, bakeries, bookstores, falafel stands, and kosher pizza bars.

Brimming with life, the place is reminiscent of New York's Lower East Side during its heyday. Invariably, Jews dressed in chassidic garb will be seen.

Be sure to visit the rue Pavee synagogue, which was designed by Hector Guimard, the same architect who made the famous art nouveau decoration for the Paris Metro.

Nearby is another not-to-be-missed site of Jewish Paris – the Memorial to the Deported, by the Seine River. This monument, a short walk from the Notre Dame Cathedral and its riverside walking path, is dedicated to French Jews who were victims of the Holocaust.

A second Holocaust monument, called the Memorial to the Unknown Jewish Martyrs, is located on rue Geoffrey-l'Ansier. An adjoining building housing a small museum and library is open 10 a.m. to noon and 2 to 5 p.m. every day but Saturday.

Another lively Jewish area is located along the rue Richer, the street which formerly had at its centre the famed — but now closed —Folies Bergeres. Here too you can find kosher restaurants, Tunisian bakeries, snack bars, and the Colbo, one of the largest Jewish bookstores in Paris.

The works of famous Jewish artists who lived in Paris —Camille Pissarro, Marc Chagall, Chaim Soutine, Amedeo Modigliani — can be seen in many of the major museums. As well, the Bibliotheque Nationale has a rich and variegated collection of Hebrew manuscripts, which can be viewed with written permission obtained in advance.

Judaism is alive and well in Paris and there are now about 50 synagogues. The mass migration of North African Jews in the early 1960s re-invigorated a community on the decline. The Ashkenazi Jews, tend to be very assimilated and are prone to intermarriage.

This story illustrates the changes the French Jewish community has undergone. The Chief Rabbi of France and the Archbishop of France meet at the Eiffel Tower. Which one of them speaks Yiddish? Answer – the Archbishop. Cardinal Lustiger, a Jewish Holocaust survivor, converted to Catholicism. The Chief Rabbi, who is Sephardi, does not know Yiddish.

Today, there are some 700,000 Jews in France – about 350,000 reside in Paris – making France the fourth largest community of Jews in the world, after the United States, Israel and the former Soviet Union.

If you travel outside of Paris, be sure to buy a France Rail Pass before you leave Canada (it cannot be bought in France). It dramatically reduces costs and helps one avoid the long ticket lines.

Another useful advance purchase is the three-day or week-long museum pass, which reduces the cost of museums and is also a time saver. The pass is issued in conjunction with a Metro subway discount card.

Walking is the best way to see Paris. But if you're there only for a few days, take a few of the city and out-of-city tours. We recommend the famed Paris Bus Tours, which picks you up at your hotel. We took a full day excursion combining the major landmarks and sites of Paris in the morning with an afternoon trip to the countryside to see Versailles.

Remember three As when school starts

TORONTO — Forget about the three Rs. As the school year approaches, countless children are learning about the three As, as in alone, anxious and afraid.

While September is a time of exciting new experiences – new classmates, and new subjects – that in itself can also make it a season of worry says Dr. Gary Freeman, a child psychologist at North York General Hospital.

"It's the great unknown," says Freeman. "In some ways, starting school is like starting a new job, but adults know what to expect. Children might lack a frame of reference. They think no one else gets the jitters."

Freeman offers these tips on how parents can help their children prepare for the school year. Some of these are especially applicable to younger children.

• Talk to your child about his or her feelings about school. Get into some specific causes of anxiety, such as saying goodbye to the parents, being left alone in the classroom and making new friends. Emphasize the positive aspects of school. And don't just have one discussion. Bring the subject up as often as you need to put the child more at ease.

• Share your own experience of starting school, and how you learned to handle it.

• Get ready for the end of summer by changing some routines. Eating, sleeping and wake up times should become more regular so that children can ease into the school schedule. Do this at least one week before school starts.

• To help children get ready for homework, parents can start structuring some school-like activities at home, such as reading time.

• Take your children along when you go back-to-school shopping, and involve them in picking out their school clothes and supplies (even if it's just one or two inexpensive items, like markers).

• Visit the school before the first day of class, just to walk through the hallways and the classrooms, and to meet some of the staff if possible. (If you have any specific concerns about your child's adjustment, share these in advance with your child's teachers and principal.)

Lowering risk of heart disease

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Most people know deep down that proper diet, exercise, and a healthy lifestyle can substantially lower the risk of heart disease. What they often are not too clear on, is just what this all means.

Enter Rob Myers, 35, a staff cardiologist at Toronto's Sunnybrook Health Science Centre, and a lecturer at the University of Toronto Department of Medicine at Sunnybrook.

His recent book Take It To Heart: your complete guide to preventing and treating heart disease (ECW Press, 1998) is a detailed and comprehensive discussion of the subject. The breezy, conversational tone, replete with jokes, makes it easy to read.

Myers told The CJN that he deliberately wrote the book that way, so that it would be "more digestible," and people would be more likely to read – and reread – the whole thing.

"Doctors often don't have the time to spend with patients discussing lifestyle issues," said Myers, adding that "it is easy to give a pill, but most of the treatment for heart disease takes place out of the office. It is up to the patient to take responsibility for his own health."

Most people don't, he acknowledged. "Seventy percent of those who have their first heart attack are smokers. Twenty-five percent die before they even reach the hospital," since they either can't recognize the symptoms of heart disease, or they don't take them seriously.

While the classic signs of a heart attack are severe pain in the centre of the chest and more pain radiating down the left arm, Myers said, symptoms can, in fact, be as deceptive as an ache in the jaw, or shortness of breath.

Myers insists that it is not that difficult to educate oneself about heart disease – "in a couple of weeks or so people can turn themselves around."

Moderating risk factors is clearly shown to limit, or even reverse, progression of the disease, he said.

Myers is strongly opposed to alternative medicine, saying at one point in Take It to Heart: "Those who advocate alfalfa juice for medicinal benefit are usually selling it."

People have to be careful and critical about information. "[A treatment] either works or it doesn't. You have to find out if it does what it claims to do (after all, you are putting something into your system), and look at the evidence. Is the information accurate? Can the results be reproduced under scientific conditions?"

Take It To Heart is not just a "how-to" book. Myers does not just tell you to eat a low-fat, high fibre diet, rich in fruits, vegetables and grains, but explains how each element contributes to a healthy heart and a healthy body.

He covers newer concepts such as the benefits of Omega 3 fat (as is found in fish), target heart rate, and white coat hypertension (normal blood pressure that changes when it is being measured by a health professional). His discussion on these topics includes tables.

About Nutrition

By LISA WEINBERG

As we get our kids ready to go back to school, I often have discussions with parents about the struggle of sending a healthy lunch to school, as well as about getting kids to eat breakfast.

Here are some important pointers to make this a little easier. First, anything at breakfast is better than nothing at all. So, I'd rather see a child eat a chocolate chip cookie for breakfast than have no breakfast.

Also, breakfast doesn't have to be eaten sitting at the kitchen table. Mornings are rushed in most households; don't feel guilty about your child eating cheese and crackers in the car, a granola bar at the bus stop or an apple in the schoolyard.

As adults, we usually like variety in what we eat, but children often do not. Don't lose sleep over your child wanting the same sandwich every day for lunch. If it's reasonably healthy and they're eating it, then you're OK.

From my experience, disguising food as Mickey Mouse will not get a child to eat something they don't like, so in most cases, save your time and creativity for a play activity and feed your children foods they like.

The thrill of racing

Love of horses is all in the family

By HARLAN ABBEY
Special to The CJN

BUFFALO — It's addictive, admitted Daryl Ezra, referring to his love of horse racing.

"It's my family's fault. My uncles, Ben, Davey, Abie, Pineapple and Joe Abromowitz had the concession to sell Daily Racing Forms at Woodbine.

"My brothers, Morrie, who's now a stock broker, and Brad, who works in the postal service, worked there starting at 11 years, just as I did," he continued with a smile, on the backstretch at the Fort Erie Race Track, where he has a stable of four horses.

But Daryl was the only one who couldn't get the thrills of racing out of his mind.

"My first love was announcing races," he said. "I won a Call A Race contest when I was 16. I have been a race caller at Barrie, Bellevue, Elmira, Kawartha Downs, Finger Lakes, Windsor and the steeplechase day at Genesee, in New York."

He was also involved in racetrack marketing and publicity before finally becoming a trainer four years ago.

"I won with the third horse I entered," he recalled, "which was good. If I'd won with my first starter, I'd have thought it was too easy.

"Every day you learn something new, if you ask questions.

"I think the hardest thing is to know who I'm running against, how to sneak up on the likely challengers if the jockeys follow your instructions and attack the contenders' weaknesses."

Some aspects of horse racing are simple, he continued. "You can't make chicken salad without some chicken, so if you have a better bred, sounder horse to begin with, you're that much ahead.

"This year my brother Morrie has bought some decent horses for me to train, horses in the $16,000 claiming class.

"They can win for $12,000 to $16,000 if they stay sound, or should still be able to win for $6,000 if they go off-form."

Daryl is the son of Jerry and Honey Ezra. His stable includes Kayla's Wish, a 4-year-old filly who had a win, two seconds and two thirds in her last four starts, moving from the $8,000 claiming level to $12,500.

No More Ruckus, a similarly aged filly, won a maiden special weights race and was moving up to the $32,000 level on the grass.

Another project is Straight Home, a high-strung grey, and Dickson County, which was claimed away from Ezra for $7,500. (He later claimed him back for $5,000.)

One new development that Ezra has added to his training practice is to ride the horses himself: "I'm tall and weigh 170," he said. "I'm not a polished rider, but I can stay on.

"Of course, I just ride the horses in slow workouts. It'd be too much strain on their legs to ride them at near racing speed.

"Straight Home started to settle down after I kept riding him slowly around the barns again and again.

"When a 112-pound jockey gets on them, they're really strong after lugging me around during the winter and early spring.

"I like to think they say to themselves, once a jockey like Lisa Hammett gets on, 'Hey, this gal knows what she's doing. I'm going to listen to her.'"

Although Ezra is doing pretty well at Fort Erie, with five wins in 13 starts, plus four seconds, he isn't sure it will continue.

"If the purses keep going up because of the installation of slot machines," he explained, "the competition is going to get much tougher. We'll have full fields of 10 to 11 horses in every race. It will be much more competitive.

"No trainers are going to have 38 percent win percentages, like I do now, or even in the low 30s and high 20s.

"But," he concluded, "racing gets in your blood. It's so addictive.

"There's an old saying, and I believe it: 'A bad day on the backstretch is better than a good day any place else.'"

ספרותנו

מאת: יעל זליגר

"דונקטור מול דונקטור נר"

"ברצפת חשכונה הומיית עד חלילה...ברחביה ורחוב רמביץ...סניף פלאץ, קפה וינה... וממול לקפה - תפנוקת רבנים, ובפנים - ישיבות אפיקורסים. מגוסטרה אל גוסטרה נדברים ארביסקטים, ודונקטור מול דונקטור נר." (עתן אלתרמן, יואריך, 1936.)

אמנון רמון, מדריך סיורים בירושלים יצחק בן-צבי, וחוקר במכון ירושלים לחקר ישראל העניק לנו ספר מרהיב המספר את סיפורה של רחביה, חשכונה חירושלמית הקלאסית. דונקטור מול דונקטור נר חושף את רחביה לא רק כשכונת מגורים נודעת, תפארת החברה לחכשרת היישוב, אלא כפסיפס צבעוני של חיי תרבות וחברה.

הייחודי ברחביה היה חשילוב המרתק בין הוזי המייסדים, חזון הבונים ואופי העולים "הייקים". קבוצת הקונים הראשונה (רכישת הקרקעות לשכונה אושרה ב- 1921) הייתה משפחות ספרדיות בראשותם של יצחק יהודה כהן וחתנו יצחק ר מולכו. רוב הבונים וסתתי האבנים היו מהפכנים, אנשי גדוד העבודה שחלמו על קומונה של פועלים. אך לימים הפכה רחביה למרכז הבורגנות הירושלמית בשל חזונם של העולים מגרמניה לחקים שכונה של גנים ובתי קפה.

המטייל בשכונת רחביה יבחין מיד שרבים מרחובותיה נקראו על שמם של גדולי חכמי תקופת הזוהר בספרד; שמואל הנגיד, יהודה חלוי, אבן גבירול, אבן עזרא, הרמב"ן וכו'. רק בשני מקרים, בשל לחץ שחפעיל מנחם אושיסקין, חוחלפו חשמות לרחוב אושיסקין ורחוב חקרן חקיימת.

כאמור, עולי מרכז אירופה בתקופת שנות ה- 30 חוללו מפנה בתולדות רחביה. ברחובות חשכונה החלו מדברים גרמנית ומושנים כ"שלאף שטונדחי", "קפה שטונדחי", "יחר פרופסורי", ו"יפראו דוקטורי" חשתלבו באווירה. שי"י עגנון, בשירה מעיד שלא חיה יום שבו לא "נזדמן לו מכיר ומודעי ברחביה. אכן, רבים מהמפרסמים בספר החיסטוריה של חיישוב גרו ברחביה. מבכירי חעסקנים חציוניים, נציגי חיי התרבות בארץ, רופאים, שופטים ועד לאנשי כספים. אך יותר מכל זוחתה רחביה עם מורי האוניברסיטה העברית. (חיילה סילסי ופטר מלך יוגוסלביה גרו ברחביה כשנה.)

ברחביה חיה ייצוג חדי רב-גווני. חיו בה בעלי חשקפת ליברליות, סוציאליסטים חילוניים, ספרדים מסורתיים, אנשי "מזרחי", אורתודוקסים וכמה ממנחיגי "אגודת ישראל". עימותים חיו מתעוררים פה ושם בעיקר בענין פתיחת בתי קפה בשבת.

בית חספר המפורסם ברחביה חיה כמובן הגימנסיה העברית (1909). את חמורות הראשונות, רחל ינאית בן-צבי מספרת "באין ספרי לימוד בעברית, תרגמתי לעצמי משפות אחרות.."

אחד מחפרקים המרתקים בספר מתאר את סגנון האדריכלות ברחביה. תושבי השכונה היו מבני המעמד חבינוני-גבוה ובנו את ביתם לפי טעמם האישי.

לא מעט בשל מעמדה הרם זכתה השכונה להנצחה בספרות העברית. חיים חזז, ב"היהישבת בגנים" מתריס על עושרה של רחביה לעומת דלות שכנתה, נחלאות. "הנה שתי שכונות...כאן אכילה ושתיה ושובע גדול וכאן מכת רעב..." גיבור שירה של שי"י עגנון, ד"ר מנפרד הרבסט אמנם מתגורר בבקעה העלית אך כל חבריו חם דרי רחביה. וכך מתאר עגנון את טיולו של הרבסט ברחביה; "...שהרי עיקר טיולו ברחביה ובסביבותיה...את מי מצא שם ואת מי לא מצא שם...אלו חזכרתי את כולם היה יוצא מעין לקסיקון של גדולי ירושלים וחכמיה עם תוספת אנשים הסמוכים לאנשי חמדע." על תחלוך שקיעתה של רחביה (בשנות הששים) מספר עמוס עוז ב"ארצות התר"; השכונה שאמורה היתה להיות פרוור-גנים נסתפה "בבנייה טרופת-נשימה" ורק חלילות מחזירים לרחביה "מעט מחלומותיה השדודים."

ספרו של אמנון רמון חינו נכס תעודי לכולנו ולא רק עבורי,שחייתי גרה ברחוב חתיבונים, שברחביה.

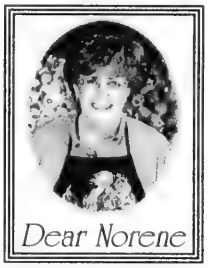
About Food



By NORENE GILLETZ

The High Holy Days are coming, and so are your guests! So much work, so little time! Holiday preparations can be overwhelming. Here are some suggestions to simplify preparations and help you get organized.

Make your guest list – the people you want, and the people you have to invite!

Plan your menu carefully if there are guests with special dietary needs (ie, diabetics, vegetarians, people on restrictive diets). I always include some of my family's favorite dishes, plus a few new ones.

Next, delegate! Let friends and family share in the preparation (and cleanup).

Children can polish candlesticks, design place cards and set the table. They can also be involved in meal preparation – helping you plan, shop and cook. In addition to teaching them cooking skills, you'll spend quality time together and create wonderful memories.

Do you have enough seating? Check your tablecloths, napkins, cutlery, china, glassware, wine decanters, serving pieces and platters. Borrow, buy or rent what's missing.

Are all your appliances working? Is there enough room in your refrigerator, freezer and oven? My friends once bought such a big turkey that they had to cook it in an industrial oven in their friend's restaurant.

Check your pantry, refrigerator and freezer. Organize your shopping list according to how foods are located in the supermarket. Don't forget honey, apples, challah, wine, candles and flowers.

Prepare and freeze as much as possible in advance – chicken soup, meatballs, tzimmes, kugels. Roast the brisket and refrigerate it overnight. Remove hardened fat, slice and freeze.

Last-minute dishes can be prepared up to two days in advance.

For Rosh Hashanah, it is traditional to serve apple slices or challah dipped in honey. Choose vegetable and fruit dishes to complement heavier dishes.

For Yom Kippur, traditional foods like chicken soup, kreplach and boiled chicken are served. To avoid thirst during the fast, avoid spicy, salty foods. Drink adequate liquids before and after fasting to prevent dehydration. To break the fast, dairy foods, fish, salads and kugels are ideal. B'tayavon – eat in good health!

COMMUNITY FOCUS '99

The Canadian Jewish news

Section B

Looking back and to the future

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

Let us begin right away by acknowledging that, for Jews, the year 2000 is not the beginning of the new millennium, with all the mystical potential the term conjures up. That event will not take place for us for about another 240 years.

Editorial

In fact, for observant Jews, the change in the century will pass virtually unmarked, as Dec. 31 this year falls on Friday night.

The CJN refuses to even get into the argument over whether the secular millennium actually falls in 2000 or in 2001. Or 6001 as opposed to 6000 in the Jewish calendar.

That being said, Jews are not immune to the intense hype, much of which, it must be admitted, is fostered by the media, implying that Jan. 1, 2000 will somehow be different from Dec. 31, 1999. We may pooh-pooh the idea, but don't all of us have a sneaking hope that some event of immense cosmic significance is about to occur?

The Community Focus supplement usually deals with what is happening in the Jewish community. This year, however, we look back at how things were for Jews over the years, and, at the end, speculate about what the community might look like in the coming years.

The supplement is framed by two scholarly articles, one by historian and archivist Stephen Speisman, the other by community planner Jay Brodbar. In between, we have nostalgic looks at Jewish life in Toronto – newspapers, schools, restaurants, bookstores.

The word nostalgia tends to have a slightly negative connotation. We think of it as a warm, fuzzy view through pink-tinged glasses, which ignores the unpretty realities of times gone by.

In some respects, that is certainly true. The early days of the 1900s were rife with anti-Semitism, poverty, harsh immigration rules, restrictive covenants. Jews could not intern in hospitals, get jobs in engineering or architectural firms, or sell at Eaton's, although they could work in the factories.

Yet, as the supplement shows, Jews were not disheartened. There was a rich cultural life, a compassionate philanthropic system, a plethora of schools and shuls. Jews created their own hospital, their own clubs, their own newspapers, theatres and cemeteries.

Certainly we focus on the good stuff. Most people do. But is that necessarily a bad thing?

This century, as was most of this millennium, was full of horror for our people. Inquisition, massacres, expulsions, pogroms, forced conversions, the Holocaust. We, of all peoples, could surely be forgiven for seeing the world as a very dark place indeed.

But we don't. Jews are endlessly optimistic. We persevere. We find things to laugh about even when it appears that crying is more realistic. We pick ourselves up and start again. We rebuild a state out of ruins and tears and hope.

While there may be some trepidation about what the next 1,000 years will bring, Jews are not trembling in terror. We seldom do.

Perhaps the lesson we can teach the world at this time is to face the new millennium with courage, and with clear eyes, acceptance and imagination. Most of all, we can transmit our hope for a brighter, better tomorrow. What greater dream can there be?

Shimon Navon: Leadership by Example

In June of 1988, physically unscathed after his tour of active duty, Shimon Navon, a reserve officer patrolling between Hebron and Bethlehem, was served a devastating molotov cocktail provided by Fatah.

Severely burned, the brave young soldier faced a daunting task. More than forty operations were required to make Shimon almost whole.

Unsatisfied with merely existing, Shimon, with the help of Beit Halochem, completed studies at Hebrew University, married and began a family. Today he is a successful entrepreneur.

An officer at heart with a strong sense of leadership by example, Shimon makes time to help fellow soldiers overcome their trauma as a regular volunteer at Beit Halochem.

Shimon Navon stands as a tribute to the IDF and to the veterans that he now serves.

1,000 years of Yiddish to be celebrated

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

The coming year will see a veritable explosion of events in the Toronto community, as the Yiddish committee of UJA Federation celebrates 1,000 years of Yiddish.

On the drawing board are plans for a Yiddish cultural and educational centre, and already inked in is a performance of the large-cast musical, On Second Avenue, by the visiting Dora Wasserman troupe from Montreal. It will be performed at the Leah Posluns Theatre at the end of October, sponsored by the Jewish Studies Department of University of Toronto.

As a culmination of the year's events, in November 2000, there will be a major three-day conference on Yiddish in Toronto, with an international cast of players.

All these initiatives come from the federation's Yiddish committee, headed by Ethel Cooper, after a coordinating committee representing the whole Jewish community held a brainstorming weekend.

The events, the Yiddish committee members believe, will prove that the riches of the pre-Holocaust era can be passed on from generation to generation, and will confirm the remarks made by the late Isaac Bashevis Singer at the Nobel Prize reception, that Yiddish will live on.

Some of the plans depend on UJA Federation's receiving a grant under the federal government's millennium fund.

About 10 percent of Toronto's Jewish population of 170,000 now speak Yiddish. The figure was about 50 percent before the Holocaust, said Sam Lipshitz, 89, a 40-year-member of the Yiddish committee.

In the 1920s and 1930s, the number of Yiddish speakers was even higher, Lipshitz said.

The decline is due to the increasing number of Canadian-born Jews, he said.

"Nobody is so foolish as to believe that in the coming years, Yiddish will be the language of the street," said Lipshitz.

"You won't buy your tomatoes in Yiddish," said Ashkenaz festival artistic director David Buchbinder. But he believes the jury is still out on what will happen to the language, considering worldwide changes in Jewish practices.

But he has absolutely no doubt that Yiddish language and culture are stronger in the Toronto Jewish community today than they were 15 or 20 years ago.

Supporters of the language are glad that the Jewish Board of Education has recognized the Yiddish Sunday school for children in North York as a supplementary school that will receive funding. They are also enthusiastic about the inclusion of a workshop on Yiddish in the Board's annual training event for teachers this summer and the attendance of Yiddish teachers from the North York school.

Major increases in funding and the necessary infrastructure are needed if Yiddish is to be strengthened in Toronto, said Stanley Sanderson, vice-president of the organization, Friends of Yiddish.

A major benefactor of Yiddish is needed, especially to train qualified teachers and to establish a Yiddish day school, Sanderson said.

The growth of Friends of Yiddish is due in part to a desire among its members not to lose the riches of Yiddish, according to executive committee member, Bess Shockett. Its monthly programs are popular and well attended, concentrating on conversation, Yiddish performers and music.

No one could foresee that the small group that met in Les Nirenberg's living room 15 years ago would tap into a gold mine.

For a taste of the color and humor that Yiddish has, I recommend a visit to the general membership locker rooms at the Bathurst Jewish Centre when the seniors are there, Monday to Friday, in the mornings. You will hear discussed such topics as current politics in Israel or pungent comments on the latest actions by Mayor Mel Lastman, in real Yiddish – unvarnished, guttural and idiomatic.

Proponents say Yiddish is not being taught in any of the Jewish day schools except Bialik and haredi schools such as Yesodei Hatorah, and is not available at the high school level at Community Hebrew Academy (CHAT).

However, Yiddish is doing well in the departments of Jewish studies at University of Toronto and York University.

Optimists point out that Holocaust survivors who immigrated to Canada speak Yiddish with all its richness, membership in Friends of Yiddish has grown from 20 to 250 in the past 15 years, 75 to 100 children take Yiddish lessons every Sunday in North York, more and more young people are enrolling in adult Yiddish classes, and Unser Yiddish Vinkl, a monthly luncheon club for Yiddish conversation founded by Ben Kayfetz, is so popular it keeps the location of its meetings secret.

But the skeptics say that young Jews growing up in Toronto are not interested in Yiddish and that in a few generations it will disappear completely.

Hyman's provided sforim for every occasion

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

As the people of the Book, wherever Jews live, they will always find a dealer who can provide them with sforim – Hebrew, Jewish and religious books.

Before the turn of the century, rabbis and scholars brought with them numerous sacred books, and from time to time, a shipment of books would arrive here.

Barenholtz on Dundas Street just west of Spadina Avenue, was one of the first shops to deal with a large range of Hebrew and Yiddish books. Others like Rains cigar and confectionary store carried a small supply of Jewish content books, but not as their main business.

In 1925, Ben-Zion Hyman, who had come from Odessa, Russia, in 1914, opened the first modern Jewish book store in Toronto at 371 Spadina Ave.

In a recent interview, Ben-Zion's son, Gurion, who was born the year his family opened Hyman's book store, said his father had received a degree in electrical engineering in Odessa, taught himself English after his arrival in Toronto, and received a degree in electrical engineering from the University of Toronto.

But overt anti-Semitism kept Jewish engineers and other professionals in low paying jobs. To keep his family, Gurion Hyman's father had to teach Hebrew and give bar mitzvah lessons part time.

"My father, who was very scholarly, was offered a job as principal at the Brunswick Talmud Torah. At the time, he was helping with recruiting teachers for the school. But he decided to go into the book business. At that time, most Jewish publications were imported from New York."

In 1926, Hyman's Bookstore moved across the street to 412 Spadina Ave., just north of Cecil Street. It was the busier side of the street and a larger facility. The Hymans rented out a flat and some additional rooms, and they also lived above the store.

For almost half a century, Hyman's was the hub of cultural activities in the city. Struggling to remain in business during the depression, the store began to add new products and services.

Hyman's had two typewriters – English and Yiddish – and a copy machine. They began translating and creating letters and newsletters for many of the landsmanshaft organizations.

This brought in many customers and made Hyman's a landmark in the city. With the needle trade on Spadina Avenue, Hyman's added business ledgers and other office supplies.

When his father realized that many boys received duplicate books as bar mitzvah gifts, Hyman's initiated a bar mitzvah registry. Since both Ben-Zion and Fannie, his wife, had beautiful handwriting, they began to personally engrave the books, which became keepsakes. And they began creating their own artistic holiday cards, many with intricate cutouts.

The store became known as the Jewish parliament of Spadina, as scholars and community leaders would congregate there and carry on heated debates. In those days, in order to stay open on Sunday, the store sold cigarettes and soft drinks.

Hyman's also had a book-lending operation, and Gurion recalls that his father used it to spearhead the establishment of a Jewish Public Library. He moved his book loan business five doors north to an empty store and donated many books to the library.

His mother, Gurion says, was the business head of the family and his father the gentle academic. Ben-Zion knew his wife would be angry if he gave away so many books, and Gurion recalls "that my father would steal the books from himself and hide them in his coat to take them to the library so my mother shouldn't know."

It is said that Ben-Zion would even give away books to scholars.

The library later followed the population and operated from Markham and Harbord streets, in a house owned by Archie Bennett. It later moved to Glengrove Avenue. Currently the Jewish Public Library is located in the Lipa Green Building.

In 1948, with the declaration of the State of Israel, there was an awakened pride in Jewish books and Israeli gifts, and the store expanded its stock to carry many Israeli-made items. Gurion recalls that it was a very busy period for them.

Their business began to drop in the 1950s – the Jewish population was decreasing and numerous synagogues and schools were moving northward.

As well, the synagogue sisterhoods and the schools began buying directly from publishers and suppliers. And with the shift northward, other Jewish books shops such as Negev, Israel's and Miriam's opened on Eglinton and further north.

In 1953, Gurion opened a branch book store at 1032 Eglinton Ave. with his wife Ruth. After some 10 years, the store was sold and became Pollock's Bookstore.

In 1970, after Fannie Hyman died, there were only a few shtieblach left downtown and a sparse Jewish population. Ben-Zion closed the store in 1971. It was the end of an era.

Recalling a vibrant market

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

I can still remember the wonderful things I smelled, when as a child, my mother took me shopping to Kensington Market on Thursdays.

Kensington Market was the hub of activity, as storekeepers – mostly East European Jews – and bargain-seeking shoppers congregated.

You could always smell bread baking in the myriad of bakery shops.

At one time, individuals could make their own bread or buns and take them to the bakery to be baked.

There were bins and large baskets of fresh fruits and vegetables, mostly in over-sized baskets. And there was the aroma of spices that would make your mouth water.

You could stick your finger in a barrel of sour pickles or tomatoes – before the health laws were passed – or you could pick out a live chicken, which Mother would feel all over, and then take down the lane to the shochet.

You could buy a fresh carp that swam in the bathtub until...but we don't want to think about that.

If you went into one of the creameries such as Mandels or Daiters, you could get fresh (almost minutes old) cheese. Usually, there was a variety of about half a dozen cheeses. We bought eggs by the crate; who knew about cholesterol.

Looking back, names come popping into my mind. Who was Mollie Pearl on Augusta Avenue? Some of the bakeries included Lottman's, Perlmutar's, and not too far away, Cohen's, Louis, Gula, Markowitz, Union, and a bagel bakery on Fitzroy Terrace which was actually a laneway. That's where Gryfe's Bakery was founded. Today, Gryfe's continues to draw long lines in any kind of weather.

The Health Bread Bakery on College Street could beat anyone in a contest for their blueberry buns.

In those days, the butcher shops sold all kinds of parts that when our children hear about it, utter, "Yuch, how could you eat that?"

There was no regulated kashrut supervision and most butcher shops had an old bearded man sleeping on a rickety chair near the door; he was the store employed mashgiach.

There were many butcher shops. The one that pops into mind is Greenspan's at the corner of Brunswick and Harbord streets.

Across the road on Harbord Street was Martin's Butcher Shop. And just up a few stores, was Tenenbaum's Poultry. There, you not only got fine chickens, but you could have a conversation with one of the Tenenbaums.

Other names that pop into mind from the 30s and 40s include Abram's on Montrose at Dundas, Cohen the butcher on Dundas, Politsky's, Nissenbaum Wohl Poultry, Poteck and Zigelstein's, and I'm told there was Ball's Butcher Shop, Wall, and Binstock, the only butcher shop run by a woman.

To further stir up memories, can you remember the grocery stores run by Orloff, Dvoreszky, Finkelstein, Edell, Schwarz, Levitts, Teichman, Brightman, Mirvish, Hurowitz and Sone. How many more can you remember?

Those days are gone forever. Today, we shop in sterile looking supermarkets, and buy mainly packaged meats, breads, pastries and pickles. Other fun-to-buy foods come in jars or plastic containers.

Most of these things have now faded into the past but the remembrances are still delicious.

COMMUNITY FOCUS

Toronto boasts rich Jewish history

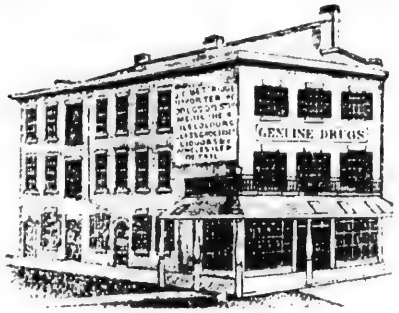
By STEPHEN SPEISMAN
Special to The CJN

When the Duke and Duchess of Cornwall and York, the future King George V and Queen Mary, debarked from their train at the top of St. George Street in October 1901, they certainly gave little thought to Toronto's Jewish community, except, perhaps, to take notice of its representatives, Rabbi Solomon Jacobs of Holy Blossom Congregation, and the Rev. Abraham Halpern, chazzan and shochet of Shomrai Shabboth Congregation.

That community, numbering just over 3,000, was a very small part of Toronto's population. There was, however, a discernible Jewish area – St. John's Ward, roughly bounded by Richmond, College, Yonge and University.

While the scions of the English Jews who had arrived in the city between the 1850s and the 1870s lived in the middle-class streets east of Yonge and had recently erected a magnificent Byzantine-style synagogue on Bond Street, the east European Jews clustered in the Ward had already outnumbered them by the turn of the century.

Just as they were separated from the English Jews by geography and by social and economic status, the east Europeans were not themselves homogeneous. They were divided by their country of origin, most visibly by synagogue: the Lithuanian Goel Tzedec, in a former church on University at Elm; the White Russian Chevra Tehillim (later McCaul Street) over a blacksmith's shop on Richmond Street; the Galician Shomrai Shabboth, which had recently occupied a building on Chestnut Street; and the Polish Beth Jacob on Elm Street near Yonge. The Romanians, still not numerous enough to have their own building, would soon found their own congregation (Adath Israel) in rented rooms in the basement of the Bond Street Synagogue.



Coombe's Drug Store on the southeast corner of Yonge and Richmond Streets, site of the first synagogue in Toronto. [Photo courtesy Toronto Historical Board]

Over the next 15 years, the Ward would develop into a flourishing North American shtetl, burgeoning with kosher restaurants, bakeries and other shops, with a Yiddish theatre and newspapers. So, also, came new ideas: socialism, Zionism, secularism, trade unionism, each of which gave rise to its own organization or, as is the case in Jewish communities, more than one.

By World War I, there were two religious schools (now Associated and Eitz Chaim) and several secularist schools (now Bialik and the Peretz Shule), in addition to congregational schools in the major synagogues. Day schools, however, were still decades in the future, and indeed were anathema to Toronto's Jews, to whom the public school was the gateway to North American life.

Although some members of Holy Blossom had major businesses – for instance, the Samuels and the Benjamins in metals, and the Goldsteins in tobacco – and the congregation even included a few professionals, many first generation east European immigrants made their living in minor commerce: peddling dry goods on the street or in the countryside, junk collecting, and either working in garment factories such as Eaton's or doing piecework on contract at home.

The lucky ones were able to open small shops, usually dealing in foodstuffs or second-hand clothing, or to use the skills acquired in Europe (bakers and shoemakers). A very few – Mendel Granatstein in waste processing, for example – even had relatively large businesses and employed other Jews.

The Jewish population increased significantly in the first decades of the 20th century. By 1921, there were about 34,000 Jews in the city. With this growth came social problems – poverty, unemployment, delinquency, prejudice, missionaries.

Earlier in the century, small voluntary associations, usually run by women, were able to assist the Jewish poor, support families whose breadwinner was ill or unemployed and provide household help for women who had recently given birth. By the period of World War I, more sophisticated methods were needed.

In 1912, the Associated Hebrew Charities was organized to provide a central clearing-house of information on families in need of assistance. In 1916, this was absorbed by the Federation of the Jewish Philanthropies of Toronto, established in that year to run a united campaign to fund the various charitable organizations. These included the Jewish Free Dispensary (1909, the predecessor to Mount Sinai Hospital), which provided free medical care and drugs to keep Jews away from the missions; and the Jewish orphanage, the Jewish Day Nursery, and the Hebrew Maternity Aid Society (now all part of the Jewish Family & Child Service).

The federation would ultimately develop into a planning organization to deal with the depression of the 1930s (United Jewish Welfare Fund) and was the predecessor to the present UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

The end of World War I gave rise to issues that extended beyond the boundaries of Toronto and required new organizations to handle them. Canadian Jewish Congress was established in 1919 to provide a single voice for Canadian Jewry at the peace conference, especially with regard to a Jewish homeland in Eretz Yisrael.

The arrival of peace also made increased immigration possible for European Jews left displaced and destitute by the hostilities. The Jewish Immigrant Aid Society of Canada, originally an arm of Congress with an office in Toronto, was created to fill the breach.

Concurrent with these developments was the rise of landsmanshaften, mutual benefit societies based on common geographic origins. These provided social activities, but also interest-free loans, medical insurance and cemetery plots, which enabled Jews often to avoid the embarrassment of approaching one of the welfare organizations. These societies would play an important role in Toronto's Jewish life for decades to come.

As the Jewish population grew in the 1920s, especially after the United States closed immigration from eastern Europe in 1924 and until Canada did the same in 1931, the new Jewish area along Spadina Avenue and in the surrounding streets (including the Kensington Market) blossomed.

Until the mid-1950s, this was the heart of the Jewish community. Here a rich cultural, commercial and religious life endured. Both professional and amateur theatre, whether in the Standard Theatre or at Alhambra Hall on Spadina Avenue, provided an escape from the struggles of daily life. Poetry readings at the Labor Lyceum or political speeches there or at the Standard, provided intellectual stimulation.

One's physical appetite was easily satisfied by a variety of restaurants – Goldenberg's, Shopsowitz's, Ladovsky's, Walerstein's, The Famous, Silver's, Abella's, Wellts', Lazar's – to name only a few. And heaven help you if you didn't finish your soup; this was considered a major affront to the proprietor.

These decades, however, were not without conflict. Jews in the garment industry banded together in unions to fight exploitation by employers. Spadina south of Dundas, as well as Richmond and Adelaide, saw bitter strikes, especially in the 1930s. These troubles often divided landsmanshaften, socialist and Zionist societies, because they included workers, managers and owners. Even families found themselves in conflict.

Another area of division, if often somewhat tamer than labor disputes, was politics. In 1900, even as late as 1950, if someone had predicted that Toronto would have had three Jewish mayors by 2000, he would have been thought ridiculous. Jewish aldermen, members of the school board, of the provincial legislature and even of Parliament were a possibility. But they represented only a relatively small constituency. To have a Jew as the spokesperson for the entire city and to have his Jewishness hardly an issue – impossible.

Other "impossibilities" earlier in the century have become realities as 2000 approaches: Jewish teachers in the public school system a commonplace, even principals and the odd superintendent; Jewish department heads and medical professors where Jewish interns were once barred; Jewish partners in non-Jewish legal, architectural and engineering firms; even the odd banking official.

City's demographic character has changed

Jews live where they wish, or at least where they can afford to live, without thought of discrimination. We appear to have made it.

The past half century has seen rapid and dramatic change in the demographic character of the Jewish community. From the mid '50s onward, the community began to move northward and eastward, with Bathurst Street as its core. (A northwesterly movement in the late 1950s up Keele Street had petered out by the early '70s.) Skipping over Forest Hill, the middle class moved first into the southern portion of North York in the early '50s (Eglinton to Wilson) and to Downsview and Bathurst Manor in the latter part of the decade (Wilson to just north of Sheppard).

The early '60s saw development just north of Finch along Bathurst and in the Bayview-York Mills district; in the past 30 years, up Bathurst beyond the city limits at Steeles through Thornhill-Vaughan into Richmond Hill. Similar development, with somewhat less density, was evident north of York Mills on Bayview, and north of Sheppard on Leslie and Don Mills into Markham. And in contrast to many larger North American cities, a discernible Jewish area continued in Toronto, especially along the Bathurst Street corridor.

The community also experienced drastic changes in its composition, beginning with survivors of the Shoah, who injected new life into the Yiddish language-based cultural life of Jewish Toronto, as well as a boost to Orthodoxy and organizational diversity.

These were followed by Hungarian Jews in the latter part of the decade, and by Moroccan Sephardim from 1957 onward. The Hungarians either reinforced Orthodox practice (along with survivors, they introduced varieties of Chassidism to Toronto) or positioned themselves to the left of the religious spectrum or with secularism.

Not having had an 18th-century Sephardi community, Toronto Jewry of the '50s, rooted in eastern Europe, looked upon the new Sephardi arrivals as exotic (after all, they didn't even speak Yiddish), and even looked condescendingly on the proud and rich heritage of the Moroccans. As 2000 approaches, the Sephardi community has integrated well into the organizational and religious life of the city, with several congregations, a day school and the magnificent new Sephardic Kehila Centre.

Beginning in the late '60s, Jews came from the Soviet Union, first a trickle and then, by the 1980s and '90s, a virtual torrent. Also in this period, significant numbers of Israelis began to arrive, and the community continues to attempt to integrate both of these groups.

Less effort in this regard was required for the South Africans and Montrealers who comprise Toronto's most recent immigrants. Without language barriers and used to highly organized communities, both of these groups quickly gravitated to existing organizations, where their talents propelled them into positions of leadership. Toronto has been fortunate in that difficulties for Jews elsewhere have enriched our own community.

But the Jewish community of the last years of the 20th century is not without its problems. Our poor are less visible than they were a century ago and most Jews are ignorant of their existence. Our communal welfare agencies are more numerous and better organized than they were, but their task is greater, especially as they struggle to fill the gap left by the retrenchment of a regressive and mean-spirited provincial government.

> It should not take a war in Israel to recognize common destiny

The maintenance of Jewish identity among our youth is more of a problem than it was a century ago. Anti-Semitism alone was sufficient then to prevent more than a few from drifting away. With acceptance and opportunity in the late 1990s, however, we struggle to find solutions privately, and especially through our communal organizations, to perpetuate our community. We make our Jewish gathering places more attractive, and provide Jewish programming to them; we pour our communal funds into Jewish education, with significant but not universal success. And the expense of Jewish day school education still requires parental sacrifice and commitment that may not always be forthcoming.

Toronto, once insignificant in the Jewish world, is now one of its premier communities. But however far we have come, we dare not become overconfident. The challenges of Y2K are great, and have nothing to do with computers.

Our community is as polarized as it was a century ago. It is not now between the affluent and the poor, between the English Jews and the east Europeans, between the Litvak and the Galicianer. Now it is between the various religious ideologies, between the affiliated and the non-identified.

It should not take a war in Israel to make us realize our common destiny.

Reform is Judaism grounded on God's living reality; where each person is God's partner in the sacred task of repairing an imperfect world. Reform Judaism sanctifies the individual yet commands informed and conscientious choices in religious practice.

Queen's student finds diversity in Toronto

By NICOLE SALAMA
Student Intern

Every time I board the train in Kingston and head home to Toronto, I sit back in my seat, smile and relax.

Kingston is the perfect university city. The community, especially the Jewish one, is friendly and welcoming. Occasionally, however, I find Kingston small, and I like to head home to the big city.

I grew up in Toronto, am tied to the city, and have always been attached to the Jewish community. I enjoy driving down Bathurst Street and seeing all of the Jewish businesses, and walking in my area and seeing mezuzot on the doorways.

I chose Queen's University because I wanted to move to a small university town. It is very convenient that Princess street (the main street) has all one might need, but I did not realize how much I was going to miss Toronto and the Jewishness I feel here.

While I am involved with the Jewish community in Kingston, and Hillel at Queen's, it is still strange for me to be at a school with roughly 400 Jews, and living in a city where the entire population is roughly the size of Toronto's Jewish community.

While its population is small, the Jewish community in Kingston reaches out to the Jewish students who live there for eight months of the year. We are always welcome at both the Orthodox and Reform congregations. (There is no Conservative congregation.) As well, for the High Holy Days and Passover, the homes of many Jews in Kingston are open to students unable to get home for the holidays.

Hillel at Queen's also tries its best to reach the Jewish students. Unfortunately, many Jewish students don't go to Hillel, but those that do, enjoy mingling with friends and eating a dinner that they don't have to cook.

Because Queen's has a small Jewish population, when we meet each other I find that a special bond forms, in particular with those from Toronto.

Wherever I go in Kingston, I usually see someone I know because Kingston is a small city and many of the university students go to the same places.

I find it interesting that while Toronto is so big, the Jewish community is fairly close knit. In one way or another everyone is connected. If I am shopping downtown or going out with friends I frequently see familiar faces. I enjoy this sense of a smaller community within a larger one.

I love the size of Toronto, its diversity, and the fact that there are numerous places to go and things to see. Typically, I don't take advantage of the plethora of options open to me, but it is nice to know they are there. When I do have the urge to do something different, at least I have numerous things to choose from.

When I was in high school, I never appreciated Toronto. I rarely explored the city and now I wish I had more time to do so.

On some level I believed that the world was somehow Jewish. What else was I to think? I went to Hebrew school for my entire life, Jewish or predominantly Jewish camps, and joined United Synagogue Youth, etc.

I knew about the small Jewish presence at Queen's, but living there opened my eyes to many different things.

I realize now how much I took for granted in terms of my Jewishness. Not everyone knows how tasteless matzah is or even what it is. It's odd to feel as if you are the only Jewish person in a movie theatre.

That is why I enjoy my visits to Toronto. I like Shabbat dinners of chicken and knishes, and it's a bonus that I don't have to cook. I find it fun to go out with friends knowing I will see other acquaintances, especially on the days before the High Holy Days and Passover when everyone returns from university.

Working at The CJN has also broadened my perspective on what Toronto's Jewish community has to offer. There are services I never knew about that are of great value to the community. It is comforting to know that whatever you might need, the community offers.

Personally, I never knew about all of the events that occur on a weekly basis, such as Jewish themed concerts and discussion groups held by rabbis. I was also unaware of the volunteer opportunities available through numerous organizations such as UJA Federation and B'nai Brith. If you need the help or if you want to help others there are opportunities here to do it all.

All in all, I think Toronto is a fantastic city. Yes, I admit I run off to Kingston to escape big city life, but I often find myself longing for the diversity and Jewishness that Toronto has to offer.

Jewish press has thrived throughout the 1900s

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

When they arrived in Canada in the early decades of this century, Jews turned to their own newspapers to help them make their way in the new land.

Written in Yiddish or English, and published in eastern, central and western Canada, these papers produced colorful publishers and editors who waded into controversial issues.

Many of them figure prominently in the pages of A Century of the Canadian Jewish Press: 1880s-1980s, written by Lewis Levendel.

At one time Winnipeg had three weekly newspapers competing for circulation. Today it has one – the Jewish Post.

Toronto has one weekly, The Canadian Jewish News. The Jewish Standard, also based in Toronto, is published several times a year. Others, like the Canadian Jewish Review and the Jewish Chronicle, no longer exist.

There are also successful Jewish newspapers in Vancouver, Edmonton, Calgary, Winnipeg, London, Toronto and Montreal.

Since this community supplement is not distributed in Montreal, this article will not deal in depth with the Montreal scene where The Kanader Adler (Canadian Eagle), the beacon of Yiddish journalism in Montreal, is just a memory.

As well, there are thriving bulletins in Ottawa and Hamilton, synagogue publications for all streams of Judaism, and specialized papers put out by organizations such as B'nai Brith Canada and by the Russian Jewish community of Toronto. Many organizations, such as the Canadian Jewish Congress, also publish their own newsletters.

Although the ideological disputes differ from those of the past (pro- or anti-Zionist stances were common before the State of Israel was established in 1948), the papers of today still speak out. Most of those that survived tend to give voice to diverse viewpoints.

The Daily Hebrew Journal, first published in Toronto in 1912 (it introduced an English page in 1938), is no longer in operation. Its irrepressible editor, Samuel (Shmuel) Shapiro, had a "hit list" of people whose names, he vowed, would never appear in his paper.

The editors of its English page included David Rome, Ben Lappin, Leo Hayman and Moishe Franks, principal of the Brunswick Talmud Torah. His son, Reuven Franks, is a well-known NBC journalist.

The heyday of Canadian Jewish newspapers was in the middle of the century. Many of the journalists were also teachers, among them was Bernard Wind, a columnist for the Daily Hebrew Journal.

Although he already had two jobs, Wind was on the lookout for a third, for the admirable purpose of keeping himself away from the racetrack.

It may come as a surprise to our younger readers that the fierce debates about Zionism which followed the anti-Jewish riots in Palestine in 1929, led to the founding of the Jewish Standard in Toronto by Rose Dunkelman.

This publication gave pro-Zionists an English language forum to counteract the editorials in the Canadian Jewish Review, some of which were written by Rabbi Maurice Eisendrath of Holy Blossom Temple.

Julius Hayman, 91, who graduated from the University of Manitoba law school, became editor of the Standard in 1935, buying it a few years later. Still technically its publisher, Hayman has been associated with the Standard for 64 years.

His son, Michael, now its managing editor, said the Standard is one of the few remaining independent Jewish publications still in existence.

M.J. Nurenberger, a member of the Herut party, founded The Canadian Jewish News in 1959 and later, after he sold the paper to its present owners, established the now defunct Jewish Times.

Now in ill health, Nurenberger was an editor who made enemies as well as friends. He achieved international prominence with the publication of The Silent Jews, a book about the failure of the American Jewish establishment to rescue Jewish victims of the Holocaust.

The developer A.B. (Archie) Bennett, regarded as the senior statesman among Canadian Jewish journalists, contributed thoughtful columns to a number of publications over seven decades. His son, A.J. (Avi) Bennett, is chairman of the Canadian publishing company, McClelland & Stewart.

The Yiddishe Neius, a supplement with Toronto News, was distributed to subscribers to two New York Yiddish daily newspapers from 1935 to 1955. Edited by Morris Goldstick, it was a fixture on the Toronto scene.

Max Grafstein of London, a prosperous textile businessman, and uncle of Senator Jerry Grafstein, was a publisher and editor of distinction. One of his projects was a collection of the writings of Sholom Aleichem. He also edited The Jewish Observer.

Senator Grafstein once went to a book signing in Toronto by Isaac Bashevis Singer. When he mentioned the name Grafstein, Singer muttered under his breath, "Didn't like him then, don't like him now." Later Singer explained that Max Grafstein had once sold a story to the Bintl Brief in The Forward in New York for $3 while he (Singer) got only $2 for his story.

Before he suffered a breakdown in the mid 1950s, A.M. Klein, the distinguished Canadian poet and novelist, was an editorial and feature writer for the Canadian Jewish Review and a publicist for Sam Bronfman and the Canadian Jewish Congress.

Though there have been many changes in their coverage and make-up, veteran Canadian Jewish journalist Ben Kayfetz is optimistic about the future of Canadian Jewish newspapers, believing the papers will continue to improve as they meet changing tastes of readers.

These are a few...

By ZAHAVA KLEINERT
Special to The CJN

As we pass into a new millennium, we should take some time to look back at some individuals who have left an indelible mark on our Jewish community.

As I researched this article, I realized that an astonishing number of rabbis, communal leaders, artists and entrepreneurs, both men and women, have contributed to the rich panorama of Jewish life.

This is not a research project, merely a backward look at some – but not all – of those who affected our lives. How many do you know, and how many more can you add?

One of the first names that comes to mind is Ezekiel Hart – a pioneer and major figure in the evolution of civil liberties in Canada.

Elected to the legislature of Lower Canada in 1807, Hart was denied the right to take his seat because the law regulated that all members of the House had to take their oath "on the true faith of a Christian."

But, thanks to Hart, the law was altered in 1832, some 25 years before similar legislation was removed from the statutes in Great Britain.

Senator David Croll served as mayor of Windsor and was elected to the Ontario legislature. He was the first Jew to attain cabinet rank in a provincial legislature. He was elected member of parliament and then became the first Canadian Jew to be appointed to the Senate.

Nathan Phillips immediately pops into memory. A member of the Toronto City Council for 36 years and mayor of Toronto for eight years, he was honored with the naming of the civic area, Nathan Phillips Square.

Also memorable are Allan Grossman, Toronto alderman, provincial cabinet minister and MP; Philip Givens, alderman, controller and mayor of Toronto; and Herb Gray elected in Windsor as an MP and presently the deputy prime minister of Canada.

David Lewis, one of Canada's labor leaders, leader of the New Democrat Party and member of parliament, was the first Jew to lead a federal party.

J. B. Salsberg, a leader in the Canadian labor movement and the Labor Progressive party, alderman in the City of Toronto and a member of the Ontario legislature, was a featured columnist with The CJN.

We could add more names to this list such as Louis Rasminsky, governor of the Bank of Canada; Abraham Lieff, supreme court judge; and Bora Laskin, chief justice of the Supreme Court of Canada.

Jews played an important role in the field of entertainment, and comedians and writers John Wayne and Frank Shuster stand out. They had an illustrious career on CFRB radio and with the Wayne and Shuster Show, which aired across North America and beyond for many years.

They appeared with many celebrities including Ed Sullivan and Jack Benny.

Outstanding composers and conductors include Louis Applebaum, Srul Irving Glick, Victor Feldbrill, Boris Brott, Milton Barnes and Percy Faith, who went south of the border along with a host of others.

Also in the entertainment world was Lorne Green whose distinctive voice enthralled the country with the news. He established a school called the Academy of Radio Arts and he became the beloved, benevolent father in the long-running series, Bonanza.

Who can forget Bert Pearl, writer and vocalist, who for many years was the star and MC of the Happy Gang; Lou Jacobi, actor in Yiddish and English who moved to New York and became an international performer; Basya Hunter, an outstanding teacher, writer, actress and director; Leo Orenstein, Paul Kligman, Lloyd Bochner, and Cec Linder.

And what about Harvey Hart, Walter Susskind, meteorologist Percy Saltzman, Eugene Kash, Maureen Forester, Harry Rasky, Kenneth Soble, and those who provide entertainment such as Ed Mirvish, Simcha Jacobovici and Moses Znaimer. And Sam Sniderman, who changed the face of the record selling business?

Among our writers and historians, we have such illustrious names as Mordecai Richler, Leonard Cohen, Irving Layton, Matt Cohen, A.M. Klein, Barbara Frum, Miriam Waddington, Adele Weisman, Yiddishist Sam Lipshitz, poet Donia Cleman, Sydney Katz, critic Nathan Cohen, and editorial writer and author Mark Gayne.

Journalists include Julius Hayman, editor and publisher of The Jewish Standard; Meyer Nuremberger; Ralph Hyman; Maurice Lucow; and historians David Rome, Stephen Speisman, Ben Kayfetz, Gerald Tulchinsky, H.M. Caiserman, Harold Troper and Irving Abella.

Outstanding women of our times include Judy Feld Carr, who saved thousands of Syrian Jews; Ida Siegel, community leader and the first Jewish female to be elected as a member of the Toronto Board of Education; Mattie Rotenberg, an educator and broadcaster; Julie Koschitzky, former national president of Canadian Jewish Congress, and psychologist and community leader Reva Gerstein.

We could also include Balfoura

Gordon, Sophie Bennett, Dora Till, Dora Wilinsky, and Marvelle Koffler, who worked so diligently for the good of the community, Rose Wolfe, chancellor of the University of Toronto, Judge Rosalie Abella, and Yiddish writer Rochel Korn.

Our outstanding community leaders are a roster of who's who.

Archie Bennett, the founding executive member of the Canadian Jewish Congress, Samuel Bronfman, Sam Ruth, Ben Dunkelman, Charles Bronfman, Louis Lockshin, Kurt Rothschild, Meyer Gasner, Irving Oelbaum, Donald Carr, D. Lou Harris, David Newman, Ben Sadowski, Samuel Granatstein, Fredrick Catzman, Saul Sigler, Mark Levy, Joseph Tanenbaum and Abe Posluns are only a few.

Impressive in our history are the rabbis who helped build our synagogues and institutions of learning. A book can be written about many of these clergymen. Rabbis Jacob Gordon, founder of the Simcoe Street Talmud Torah; Gedalia Felder, teacher and author of eight books on Halachah and chair of the Rabbinical Vaad Hakashruth; Yehuda Leib Graubart, and scholar, Nachman Shemen.

An outstanding orator, Rabbi Irwin Witty, headed the Board of Jewish Education. Also important are rabbis David Ochs, spiritual leader of Torah Emeth; Abraham Feinberg of the Holy Blossom Temple; Abraham Price; Dov Shochet; Joseph Kelman, founder of Kadima, She'arim and the Reena Foundation; Israel Frankel of the Jewish Public Library; and Bernard Rosensweig, who headed the North American Orthodox rabbinate.

Rabbis Walter Wurzburger, Stuart Rosenberg, Gunther Plaut, Reuben Slonim, David Monson and Erwin Schild, all contributed to the growth of their congregations.

In the field of medicine, many names jump to the foreground: doctors Nathan Rosen, Samuel Hurwich, Maxwell Bochner, Arnold Epstein, D. Louis Harris, Sam Esser, and Henry Goldenberg, just to skim the surface.

Most important to our history are our educators: Levy Jacober; world renowned professor Emil Fackenheim; Itshi Mayer Korolnek; Benjamin Clodman; Joseph Klinghoffer; M.Z.R. Frank; Itzchok Matenko; and hundreds of other dedicated teachers and administrators. Each of us has our special list.

Numerous other outstanding characters can be included: artists such as Aba Bayefsky; award-winning poet Simcha Simchovitch; sculptor Sorel Etrog, and too many others to mention.

Academics abound, such as the Shapiro brothers, presidents of McGill University and Princeton. In the fields of business and industry are the Reichmann family, Leslie Dan, Peter Munk and Joseph Rotman.

These names merely give us a sense of what talent and energy there is in the Jewish community. A research project should be undertaken to document the lives and accomplishments of our leaders who have set a pattern of devotion to our community – one that should be emulated from generation to generation.

Jewish schools have adapted to change

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Throughout the centuries, Jewish learning has always been a priority, regardless of where a Jew lived.

At the beginning of the 20th century, Yiddish, the mameloshen, was the language most often spoken by the Jews who came to North America, as Hebrew was then considered the language of prayer and study.

With the arrival of Jews to Canada, Yiddish began to fall away to be replaced by English. But the need to study Hebrew for religious studies remained an unquestioned necessity.

The first organized Jewish community in Toronto was formed in 1849, when a deed was granted to Abraham Nordheimer to allow him to set aside an area for a Jewish burial ground on Pape Avenue.

This was their first requirement; education was the next priority.

From the beginning, small clusters of students gathered to learn with a rabbi or melamed, and in 1907, under the guidance of Rabbi Jacob Gordon, a group of community leaders founded a school on Simcoe Street – the forerunner to the current Associated Hebrew Schools of Toronto.

The school's mandate was to teach the Ivrit-b'Ivrit method, using Hebrew as the language of instruction, which was then considered a radical departure. They also implemented modern teaching techniques. Anything modern was considered suspicious, and the school met with resistance.

YMHA (right) nestles beside the Brunswick Talmud Torah.

In 1915, a group of Jews, mainly from Poland, found that the teaching at the Simcoe Street school departed too much from strict religious doctrines.

Reb Itshe Meyer Korolnek, who had a flaming red beard, and a group of pious men therefore planned a school that would meet their needs.

With an enrolment of seven children, they established Eitz Chaim Talmud Torah on Chestnut Street, and confined its teaching to the Torah, talmudic writings and the liturgy.

In 1917, they moved the school to D'Arcy Street and it became known as the D'Arcy Street Talmud Torah. The school later moved to Viewmount Avenue and today Eitz Chaim has three branches, some reaching beyond the boundaries of the city.

The Simcoe Street school moved to Brunswick Avenue in 1924 and became known as the Toronto Hebrew Free School or the Brunswick Avenue Talmud Torah. Although the school closed for a short time during the Depression, it did reopen and soon followed the ever-changing Jewish community by opening a number of satellite branches and affiliated schools throughout the city.

The first school that was not based on religious practice was formed in 1911, offering a secularist Jewish education with emphasis on Yiddish language and culture. It became the I.L. Peretz Institute, operating under the wing of the Arbeter Ring (Workmen's Circle now located on Lawrence Avenue West).

In 1919, Poalei Zion broke off from the Peretz school, and the Labor Zionists established their own shule known as the Farband Folk School, which later merged with Bialik Day School.

Heightened interest

Left of the Poalei Zion, the Borochov School was formed. Still further left, the United Jewish People's Order sponsored the Morris Winchevsky School, which is currently housed on Cranbrooke Avenue.

After the declaration of the State of Israel, a new awareness of our roots brought a heightened interest in the Hebrew language and Jewish education.

In the 1950s, as the day school model began to take hold despite the criticism of those who called the system segregationist, the Associated Hebrew School moved to Bathurst Street and Neptune Drive. The Associated now operates three branches to accommodate the established and newly built areas

One-by-one day schools began to develop, encompassing every shade of ideology and practice. Two of the larger day school systems in the GTA are the Conservative movement's United Synagogue Day School with three branches, and the Reform movement's Leo Baeck Day School.

Today, there are 29 day schools listed with the Board of Jewish Education with a total population of 10,700.

As well, there are two special education day schools, She'arim Hebrew Day School and Zareinu Educational Centre. The Yeshiva Ahavas Torah, a school for boys, is a special education high school.

More and more day high schools are forming, the largest of which is The Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT).

In the early years, many synagogues did not operate a Hebrew or religious school. One of the first to do so was Holy Blossom Temple, which maintained a religious school on Sundays.

Later, however, many synagogues, especially Conservative congregations, offered religious and Hebrew classes. The Reform temples added classes on Saturday and during the week.

In an article such as this, it is not possible to list all the Jewish schools in the area, and therefore this is not a complete treatment of the educational scene but merely the essence of what has developed over the years.

In 1950, the Bureau of Jewish Education, now the Board of Jewish Education of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, was established. It has played an important role in co-ordinating and planning for the future in Jewish Education.

Kosher businesses throughout the Toronto area

One of the most important changes in the life of Toronto's Jewish community is that there is a unified system of kashrut supervision, under what is now called the Kashruth Council of Toronto (COR).

Here is a partial list of some of the businesses certified as kosher by COR.

BUTCHER SHOPS

IGA (Clark & Hilda); B. Goldstein Products; Hartman's Kosher Meats; Manor Kosher Meat Market; Perl's Meat Products Ltd.; Prime Kosher Meats; Glatt Kosher Stroli's Meats.

BAKERIES

COR approved bake shops are closed on Saturdays and use only certified ingredients in their baking. There are many misconceptions about the ingredients marked on any package. Vegetable shortening, as an example, may not necessarily be made from all vegetable components and may include some animal fat. Some bakeries may add milk or milk derivatives to their breads and challahs. Careful scrutiny of all ingredients used in baking is of vital importance to the consumer interested in kosher products.

Anita Bengio Patisserie Inc.; Carmel Bakery, Div. Premium Kosher Products; Dairy Treats European Cafe/Bakery; Eti's Cakes Ltd.; IGA (Clark & Hilda); Hermes Bakery; Hole in One; Isaac's Bakery Limited; My Zaidy's Bagel; My Zaidy's Bakery (1999) Inc.; Richman's Bakery; Sweet York Desserts.

TAKE OUT SERVICES — CATERERS

Kayfetz adds personal touch to history

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

If you are looking for information about the history of our community, Ben Kayfetz is one of the people you should talk to.

Not only is he knowledgeable, but he is always willing to share his vast storehouse of information, and he will always add a few personal stories to make the times come to life.

Over the years, Kayfetz has worn many hats. He was a professional communal worker before his retirement, and a keen lay observer. Kayfetz is a prolific writer, broadcaster and advocate for human rights.

Now in his 80s, Kayfetz has rubbed shoulders with the notables in the Jewish and secular communities.

Born in Cabbagetown, he attended Charles G. Fraser public school and Parkdale Collegiate. He studied languages at the University of Toronto, and after graduation, taught in Niagara Falls at a private high school and later in Huntsville, Ont.

He recalls that those were the days when Jewish teachers had great difficulty finding a position.

During the war, he went to Ottawa to read mail to and from prisoners of war.

After the war, he was sent to Germany as a uniformed civilian to monitor the long distance telephone calls and telegrams of the civilian German population.

Towards the end of his two-year stay in Germany, he received a letter from Ben Lappin, director of community relations at the Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region. Lappin informed him that he was going to return to school to do postgraduate studies, and he asked Kayfetz if he was interested in applying for his position. That letter set the direction for his life.

He remembers being interviewed for the position by Rabbi Abraham Feinberg, who chaired the committee, and community leader J. Irving Oelbaum.

Kayfetz took the position. The mandate was to organize and promote the passage of an anti-discrimination law. As the years went on, he became involved in numerous committees.

Some of the activities included international affairs, kashrut, archives, Soviet Jewry and wherever else his expertise was needed.

Ben Kayfetz

In 1947, discrimination was evident everywhere in the community. It only took four years of intensive effort and co-operation from the leaders of the Jewish community for the fair labor laws to be enacted – they thought it would take 10 or 12 years. The laws were later expanded to include housing and other human rights areas.

Kayfetz recalls that in those days, sexual preference, age discrimination, disabilities and gender were totally ignored. "It was difficult to get people to shut out their biases. It was considered normal to have them. It didn't even come under consideration for a long time – it wasn't on anyone's agenda."

Quiet spoken and an outstanding communicator, Kayfetz has witnessed many other changes in his lifetime and some things that he believes have not changed fast enough.

He is unhappy that in some areas in Canada, school teachers still believe that they have a right to teach their religion in the public school system.

A major change, he notes, is that for many years, Jewish politicians were generally elected from wards with large Jewish populations. He cites Herb Gray as an example of change.

"Gray came from an area in Windsor with a small Jewish community. Now, Mel Lastman is the super mayor and there is no thought of him hiding his Jewishness."

He adds that today, anti-Semitism, where it exists, is covered up. "No politician would be foolish enough to say anything in public that is remotely considered anti-Jewish."

Other changes, he notes, are in our immigration policies. "Now they are not based on racism."

For Jews, a dramatic change in attitude has taken place in corporations, major law offices, hospitals, and in the financial world. "In 1928, the Toronto General Hospital agreed to take one Jewish doctor a year on staff. You could get into medical school, but not into a hospital."

Adamant that he is not a professional historian, Kayfetz has published numerous articles and monographs on the Jewish community. He has been a contributor to the Jewish Standard, the Globe and Mail, the Jewish Chronicle of London, England and the Jewish Telegraphic Agency.

Kayfetz has not only been a astute observer of the Canadian and Jewish scenes, he has also affected change for the improvement of our communities.

CJN ad rep says goodbye

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Ruth Goldsmith is 70 years old – and doesn't mind who knows it.

She is a passionate lover of classical music, nature and family, a feminist, and a proud member of the Orthodox community – with reservations.

CJN advertisers know her better as advertising consultant for organizations for the past 20 years, a job she describes as "work I love doing, and they even pay me to do it!"

Goldsmith's era at the paper will come to a close at the end of August, when she retires. Well, sort of.

While she won't be coming in to The CJN four days a week, vegetating is not on her agenda. Her plans include travel, volunteering, working on behalf of the Older Women's Network and rights for older women, spending more time with her husband, Ernest, a retired engineer for Toronto Hydro, with daughter Naomi and grandchildren Aliza, Shira and Avi, and with her many friends.

As well, Goldsmith says, "Opportunities tend to appear. I have had to say no to many opportunities. Working women have to limit their extracurricular activities.

"I'm looking forward to a more relaxed lifestyle," she says, without even a laugh.

She describes the responsibility she has had at CJN as "supporting and working with organizations in varying their advertising, and getting the best value they can for the budget they have available."

Ruth Goldsmith

Since advertising budgets tend to be limited, she wanted to give her clients "the opportunity to advertise where it is most appropriate for them, where and how to maximize the benefits."

In the years since she began at The CJN, the most positive change she has seen, in her estimation, is that "as the community has grown, more women professionals are found in positions of authority, such as executive directors."

The people she deals with she finds to be "more committed, qualified, educated and idealistic. They are proud of being Jewish, and are more confident and self-assured."

Goldsmith is a firm advocate of the concept of klal Yisrael – Jewish unity, one might say.

"I love how The CJN reflects all viewpoints. Its editorial policy is that we are all Jews, and all points of view should be respected. That is very healthy," she says.

This philosophy of openness she sees in CJN staff. "They are a mix of all ages, backgrounds, creeds, religions. There is a tremendous team spirit – we all support each other, not just within each department, but between departments too."

Technology has transformed the advertising world, she says. "When I started 20 years ago, there were no faxes or computers, and only a primitive telephone system. [Now, we can] provide better service, and give better support to our advertisers. It is very satisfying."

Goldsmith is very involved with the Older Women's Network, an advocacy group to promote the rights of older women, in such areas as health care, housing, transportation, pensions.

"The Older Women's Network is the ideal venue for my efforts as I age," she said, noting that "within the Orthodox community, as a woman, volunteer opportunities are somewhat limited. While I was on the board of my shul, more responsible positions are not available to me as a Torah observant Jew."

Goldsmith believes firmly that "women in the Orthodox community have spiritual needs that are not being fully met." As an example, she cited the opposition of most Orthodox rabbis to women's prayer groups. She was hurt when she was told by rabbis that while women are permitted to perform many mitzvot such as saying Kiddush and Kaddish, "we are not obligated and it doesn't count."

Women will only attain true equality, she insists, by studying Torah. Then, she says, they will be able to debate men on their own level.

Those who try to effect change in women's status by opting out of religious observance are "deluding themselves," she says.

"Those who stay within Orthodoxy are the ones involved in real change. You don't want to desecrate principles that are precious."

Goldsmith and her husband came to Canada in the late 1950s, after spending six years in Brazil. Before coming to The CJN, she worked as a secretary, did public relations and wrote speeches.

Among her past employers were Rabbi Abraham Feinberg of Holy Blossom, Rabbi David Monson ("I loved working with him. He was the first one who recognized me as a person, not just a dictating machine"), Israel Bonds, JNF, and Canadian Jewish Congress.

She was the first mature student in the community college system when she enrolled at Centennial College in 1967 and earned her diploma in journalism.

Somehow, she also found time to do volunteer work, especially for Mizrachi Women (now Emunah), Shaarei Tefillah and Eitz Chaim.

"Volunteer work is rewarding in a way no other work is. I felt self-actualized."

It will surprise no one if Ruth Goldsmith continues to appear at the doors of The CJN on behalf of one of her many interests. We wish her good luck, good health and good fortune.

Enjoying an historic nosh

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Food wonderful food. Many religious and social events in all cultures centre around food.

It is therefore no surprise that in the Jewish community, over the years, restaurants, delicatessens and catering facilities have played a major role in our lives.

The CJN asked this writer to scan her memory and jog the memory of some of our readers over 50, as we try to recall the eating facilities of yesteryear.

We are not historians and this is not a scholarly report; the following is, therefore, not a complete list of early gastronomic establishments, and some names may not be absolutely accurate, but they certainly will bring back memories.

Back in the 1930s and earlier, restaurants and other food establishments did not have kashrut supervision, because most owners were observant and it was assumed that everyone was kosher.

Today, however, the Kashruth Council of Toronto is the primary agency for kashrut supervision here. The offices are located in the Lipa Green Building.

Strolling down memory lane to the days when most of us lived in the area bounded by Dundas and College, Spadina and Ossington, there were numerous drugstores that had a food and fountain counter.

Familiar names of restaurants included Goldenberg's, Tel Aviv, Quality, Mintz (later a tavern), Shekters, the Rumanian Grill, Rubin's and United Bakers.

If you wanted a corn beef or pastrami sandwich, you went to delicatessens like the Edelists', Pancer's, Wasser, Kalb, Altshuler, Paskowitz, Becker's, Switzer's, Wellts, Eppes Essen or Shopsowitz.

And you could find familiar faces at The Bagel restaurant on College Street just west of Spadina. People gave it unflattering names, but it had a loyal clientele.

In catering, who can forget the Murray House on Beverley Street. It was "the place to get married," and they had all the trimmings.

As the community moved north and east, so did the eating establishments, leaving behind the facilities for other ethnic food purveyors.

The granddaddy of the Jewish restaurants is the United Bakers Dairy Restaurant, which closed its doors on Spadina Avenue in 1986 after 75 years, and is now operating in its 87th year.

Restaurateur Herman Ladovsky, who was born the year the original store opened, can remember much of the history that flowed through the restaurant.

You can often see the spry and jovial Ladovsky at the restaurant, located in Lawrence Plaza since 1984, meeting and greeting people and often telling one of his jokes or stories.

The restaurant is now operated by the third generation, Ruthie Ladovsky and her brother Phillip. As far as we know, it is the only restaurant in Toronto that has survived the generations.

Ruth, Herman and Philip Ladovsky relax at the Lawrence Plaza United Bakers Dairy Restaurant. A photo of the original restaurant on Spadina hangs behind them.

Looking to the future

By JAY BRODBAR
Special to The CJN

It is said that since the destruction of the Temple, prophecy is reserved for children and fools.

It has been a long time since I have been mistaken for the former, and I do not relish the latter designation; thus I ought to resist the temptation to prognosticate. So what you will find here is neither prophecy nor prognostication but rather a series of qualified guesses and questions about what our Jewish community might look like in the coming century.

If you are the kind of person who chuckles at five-day weather forecasts, then you have the necessary skepticism required to read on.

Most demographic forecasts use as their basis census data of some sort or another. For any year that we have data, the information is critical. But when these numbers are used for prediction, no one is infallible.

I have in my files a report by UJA Federation's top planner in the late '80s surmising that Greater Toronto's population "by the turn of the century could approach 150,000." Little did he know that in fact the community had reached that landmark even while he was writing his forecast and now, as we shall see, some estimates put our population as over 200,000.

This forecast was not alone in dramatically underestimating the growth of our community. Why? Population numbers change for basically three reasons: births, deaths and migration. The last is especially hard to estimate, since it is sensitive to economic and political factors such as war, economic depression, immigration policies and political movements that occur on both national and global arenas.

The vast proportion of our dramatic growth (for example, 34,000 from 1981 to 1991) was due to high immigration. Toronto draws immigrants, and Jewish immigrants are no exception. Interestingly, our community's recent growth is due about equally to people moving here from abroad and to those coming from other parts of Canada.

It is also important to take into account, not just the total numbers, but how those numbers distribute themselves throughout the GTA. Here again, there are factors beyond our control, like the type and cost of housing, the development of transportation infrastructure, and the location of schools, synagogues and health and recreational facilities.

For example, the presence of Jewish seniors in York region is very small. But that can change, depending on the nature of housing and services that become available, as well as such factors as a more integrated mass public transportation system throughout the GTA.

In spite of the fact that we can't anticipate the kinds of political and economic events that might dramatically increase immigration to Toronto or emigration out of Toronto, all things being equal, there are certain safe bets for the immediate and longer-term future. These include the continued dramatic growth in the number of frail elderly (those over 75), as well as the dramatic growth in the overall senior population as the baby boom generation ages. Certain differences in the characteristics of various geographic areas are also likely to remain.

For example, York Region is disproportionately home to young families, and as suggested earlier, unless housing stock (such as apartments and condominiums and assisted living) is adequate, mass transit expands and elder services are increased, this trend is likely to continue.

What will the GTA look like in terms of overall population numbers? The GTA task force several years ago commissioned some projections for its own purposes. Based on assumptions of flat fertility levels, a complicated scenario of shifting mortality rates, and due to its historical volatility, fairly complicated immigration scenarios, the task force estimated a series of projections until the year 2031 based on the 1991 census.

If we apply similar assumptions to the Jewish population of the Toronto Census Metropolitan Area (CMA), which is fairly equivalent for our purposes, to the GTA, we come up with the following projections:

2001 – 203,803
2011 – 234,287
2021 – 263,397
2031 – 294,780

The task force also projected alternative low and high scenarios. Even by the former, our community would reach just under a quarter of a million persons by 2031; by the latter, it would reach close to a staggering 360,000.

When we look at the amount of change for various age groups between 1991 and 2021, we can see the impact of the baby boom in successive peaks of increases in the older groups as we move into the future. This has all the implications discussed in the widely read book by David K. Foot Boom, Bust and Echo.

The most dramatic changes will follow the baby boomers. For example, in 1991 there were under 7,000 Jews in the 70 to 74 age group; by 2031 that number is predicted to be close to 17,000.

When we look into the future, we also need to take into account that Greater Toronto Area Jewry, as noted earlier, does not have a uniform look across the whole metropolis. Different sectors have different flavors with different characteristics and needs. In terms of defined geographic areas, there are probably three we should focus on:

COMMUNITY FOCUS

York Region an area of tremendous growth

York Region, downtown and the demographic centre.

York Region has been an area of tremendous growth for both the general and the Jewish community. If treated separately, this area, with estimates of close to 60,000 Jews, would be the third largest Jewish community in Canada (after Toronto and Montreal). The vast majority of Jews live in the Thornhill sections of the cities of Vaughan and Markham, with pockets in Richmond Hill.

An important characteristic of Jews in this area is that they are young: In 1991, one out of every three was under 15 years old. It is likely that for the foreseeable future, the educational and recreational needs of this age range will be paramount, both as it moves through time (and gets older), and with the influx of new young families due to continued real estate development.

It will be interesting to see if senior-related services and housing materialize in the future. It's a bit of a chicken and egg question. Some people believe that there will be a need based on people wanting to be close to their families and grandchildren, but it is also dependent on the ability of the region to meet this age group's needs.

The downtown area for our purposes is quite large: the area south of St. Clair from the Humber River to the Beaches. With over 15,000 Jews, it is the smallest in number, but to give us some perspective, it is equivalent in size to the entire Jewish population of Ottawa.

There are a number of qualities that are characteristic of Jews living in this area: They are much more likely to be single, not young or old, nor immigrants. The downtown has the highest proportion of Jews living in one parent families.

When we compare Jews in this area with those in the other two areas of higher Jewish density, it is clear that the basis and nature of Jewish identity is different. For example, whereas only four percent of Jews in the higher density Jewish areas identified themselves in 1991 as Jews by ethnic ancestry with no religious affiliation, 20 percent of those living downtown identified themselves in that manner. In addition, close to 42 percent of Jews in the downtown area live in families where at least one spouse and/or parent is not Jewish.

There has been a lot of activity in recent years, as manifested by the formation of the Downtown Jewish Community Council, an association of 21 downtown organizations, and as seen in the role of the Bloor JCC as the magnet institution.

There are growing attempts to meet the needs of this group through the creation of greater options for Jewish education and an emphasis on the cultural programming that seems to be a key locus of identification for Jews in this area.

In some ways, this group may be hardest for which to forecast: I suspect that the success of these efforts at maintaining and revitalizing the content of Jewish life will go a long way to assure a continued Jewish presence in Toronto's downtown.

The demographic centre of the community is in North York. This area should continue to be an important core of Jewish activity. A fair portion of that area (especially along the Bathurst corridor) is composed of empty nesters, the elderly and immigrants. There could, therefore, be a diminution of Jewish life if immigration takes a significant downturn and the exodus north continues. On the other hand, given the wealth of religious, recreational and social services available, this area ought to continue as an important centre.

Finally, there is a fourth area that is most problematic because it is not geographically distinct. This involves the 20 percent or so of Jews who do not live in the other three areas. They are dispersed throughout the GTA, live in very low-density Jewish neighborhoods, and unlike the Jews of downtown whom they often resemble, do not have a defined identity or a growing Jewish infrastructure to serve them.

In future terms, these might be the Jews most vulnerable in terms of maintaining an identification with the community. Part of the challenge is finding how this group, particularly today's youth, can maintain a meaningful connection.

We have considered forecasts for the over-all population as well as the characteristics of specific areas. I would like to end with what I see as three key questions that will affect the future of our community.

The first may be seen as a strictly demographic issue: Will our community remain residentially concentrated? In the 1991 census, nearly 90 percent of the Jewish community lived where 20 percent of Toronto CMA lived. Most were located in the three areas featured above. This residential concentration is fairly unique for communities of our size in North America. It gives us a tremendous advantage in service delivery and in maintaining community cohesion. Should dramatic dispersion occur, this could have a major negative impact on the vitality and viability of our community and of Jewish identity.

The second question is only partially demographic: What will be the impact of immigration, both from abroad and other parts of Canada?

This factor, more than any other, is responsible for the doubling of our community in the last 30 years. As suggested earlier, immigration is difficult to predict because it is affected by so many external factors out of our control. However, one aspect is not hard to predict: Not only the number of immigrants but how they are responded to and how they respond are critical to the future of our community.

Immigrants can come in droves, but unless they are integrated into the Jewish community, their impact is greatly diminished. Whether they be from the former Soviet Union, South Africa, Israel, North Africa or the United States, they can easily disappear as Jews in the future.

What will community look like in the future?

Wedding party at marriage of Mr. and Mrs. Cornfield, early 1900s. [Photo courtesy The Ontario Jewish Archives: 4193]

This leads us to the third question, the most profound and difficult one: What will be the quality of Jewish life in the new century? The future of the Jewish community is not only, or probably chiefly, a demographic issue.

Will we continue to take care of our less fortunate members, modelling Jewish values such as gmilut chasadim and tzedakah? Will our Jewish educational system meet the needs of a diverse Jewish community with quality and flexibility? Will it address the needs of both children and adults? Will the creativity and richness of our Jewish culture bloom? Will our diversity be a source of richness and strength or of divisiveness and weakness? Will that diversity include an option of choices to make it possible for a broad range of people to continue identifying with a community, a people and a tradition that are both ancient and contemporarily relevant?

Of course, this last set of questions can be asked of Jewry throughout the world, especially outside of Israel. Our community has an advantage: Demographically, in terms of numbers and geographical concentration, it is strong. The institutional infrastructure represented by our social service agencies, synagogues, schools and cultural providers is rich and multifaceted. This augurs well for the future.

It is likely that the impressive numbers predicted for the next 30 years will materialize. But what these projections don't tell us is to what extent tens of thousands of persons who may indicate on a census that they are Jewish by ethnic ancestry or religion live Jewish lives.

This is particularly true as our community loses the direct influence of people whose Yiddishkeit was nurtured in the traditions of pre-war east European Jewry. To impact on that course of events, the only thing we can do is to continue to develop a vital Jewish community, with an institutional backbone that is both strong and flexible: a Jewish life that is meaningful culturally and spiritually. Numbers alone are lifeless; they must breathe Jewish souls.
